through my blundering the tunnel would be discovered, that had cost such heroic labor, and that I should be lashed with the disgrace of depriving hundreds of my fellow prisoners of their liberty. In this train of oppression thoughts came the remembrance that "this is the one time in my life that I shall be glad to be in a cell," where bodies from the hospital room above it used to be boxed up prior to burial. The revolting idea that the Union dead should ever have been placed, even temporarily, in such a place sickened me, and I would have given a fortune at that miserable moment for a friendly stream of light and a blessed breath of fresh air. I thought I had already surveyed an acre of wall and was on the border of despair when by my boundless joy my hand fell upon a pair of heels. I knew they were Libby's, for I had no sooner touched them than they vanished like magic in the wall.

Not My Business. Many good, well meaning people refuse to take any part in the business of the Confederates, because they think it none of their business. They are perfectly correct in their habits, but by their example endeavor to influence those immediately under their care to live upright, sober lives. It is the general belief that if one does not drink intoxicating liquors he will not be afflicted, or if he does not drink he will not be tempted to do so.

LEAVING THE PRISON BEHIND. Watson went off first and was followed in about ten minutes by Morgan. As I have never been closely watched the two nearest guards, who at the time halted on their posts and gazed together at the retreating forms of my two friends. I resolved should they show a sign of firing to shout an alarm to my comrades and dash down the street as fast as my feet would carry me.

Diphtheria. The following in reference to curing that dreadful disease, diphtheria, was handed a reporter with the request that it be published. The lady states that she had seven children down with the disease and all recovered except one, it being given different treatment prior to her recovery. The following recipe, she says, must be rigidly followed.

Mr. Vanderbilt's Stable. As the dwellings of modern Americans of wealth have developed into palaces, so the stables of rich owners of horses have become, buildings fitted up in a manner that surpasses in costliness and elegance the houses of a large majority of the population. Pressed brick, brown stone and marble, costly woods and cut-glass combine to make the millionaire's stable a place of luxury and even splendor. Maud S. and the other trotting wonders in which William H. Vanderbilt takes pride are housed in a manner befitting the position of the richest man in America.

Mr. Vanderbilt's stable was begun in 1879 and finished in October of the following year. It cost $60,000 without the land, which is said to be worth at least as much more. The main building is constructed of pressed brick, brown stone and marble, and has a frontage of 75 feet on Forty-second street and 100 feet on Madison avenue. All the rooms are spacious and the appointments of the finest. The box stall occupied by Maud S. is 29 by 40 feet, and the others, though not so large in size, are still of a good class.

It was removed and her good points commented upon. Aldine submitted gracefully—in fact, seemed rather to like it and to be proud of the praise that was lavished upon her. Near the door leading into the court yard was what appeared to be a box stall, but upon the door being opened it was seen to be a bed room. Here every night sleeps one of the best-liers, in order to be on hand if anything goes wrong with the horses. The partition dividing the room from the main apartment burned a hole in the wall, and the light was bright light entered in places. It was half in the sleeping room and half outside, the light filtering into the sleeping room through a green zinc curtain drawn over the glass on that side. At night when all the other lights are turned out, this one is kept burning.
