VOL. XXXIII. NO. 27.

SOMERSET, PA., WEDNESDAY, DECEMBER 17, 1884.

The editor sat in his broken chair, And watched with a hungry eye, The farmers with their two-horse carts With loads of fruit go by.

For he thought, as he saw the apples, Potatoes and peaches and coro, Of a house and farm in a far off land, The place where he was born.

And while thinking of the old homestead, The father and mother so dear, His head dropped down on his weary be And his eye shed forth a tear. And the while his thoughts were busy On that sad and wretched theme, The worn out, weary editor,

Sank into a troubled dress. He dreamed of his poyhood days again, When life to him was sweet; and he, a bright-haired cureless boy, Played 'round has mother's feet,

THE EDITOR'S DREAM.

Once again, in careless oblidioud, In his dream he seemed to roam, Mid the oreignis and the meadows Of that dear old country home; Drank once more the pure, cold water, Breathed again the fresh, free air : Lived a king within that palace. Free from want, and free from care Once again he roamed the forest,

Finding flowers rich and rure; nce again he ate the apple. And the sweet and juicy pear Went again at more and even To the school house on the hill,

Playing marbles to the meantime With his neighbors, "Tom and Bill;" Once again he bood potatoes,

Once again he dropped the corn, A blue-eyed, bare foot urchin, With his coat and trowners torn Happy in his homely costume.

Gay, ligh-hearted as the lark, luging to him in his labors From the early dawn till dark

Thus the man, aslesp and dreaming, Dreamed of other, happier days, And the printers in the office Looked upon him in amuse.

And while he was soundly sleeping. The work hours passed away ; They locked the door of the office, And stopped their teil for the day. Still the man, asleep and dreaming,

Dreatued of happier days of yore; Of his many childish pleasures, Which, alas, could be no more. As a last faint, dying sunbeam, Feli across the ginomy room,

Seattering the localy darkness. Piercing the awful gloom. He awoke with a start and shiver. Cast an auxious glunce around For the image of his vision, But, also, not one faint sound

Did he hear of what he funcion It had seemed no sweet, so real That the presence of those loved ones, He could see, could hear, could feel. But, also, his home, his childhood,

Mother, father friends and all. Had passed from his weary eye-sight, Like the suppeam on the wall. -R. W. Jackson, in Prone Press,
