VERY COMMON LAW. One day an aged millionaire Fell most extremely ill; With mournful air his mournful beirs They begged be'd make his will; And sweetly acquiescent, he Dispatched for Mr. Wright To write the document, and then Expired-that very night. His kin, with sighs of wondrous size, Remarked that life is brief, And vied with one another in Displaying vi'lent grief; And when the last sad rites were o'er. With one accord they went To hear the proper person read His latest testament.

The ready lawyer read aloud The different bequests, While very various feelings swelled Within the listeners' breasts, And some resolved with energy To break that unjust will, And some resolved with filial zeal His wishes to fulfill.

So those who held the will was right Secured Lawyer Nab, And those opposed, the service of The smart attorney Grab; And now the poor afflicted ones Plunged into legal strife, No longer shed their tears for death But let them flow for life.

To tell you how the quarrel grew I will not even try, The poetry of pros and cons Is tedious and dry ; I know they argued high and low, The usual oaths they swore, And all the cases cited that Were eyer tried before.

Time passed, and these contestants stra With still increasing rage, Until the latest litigant Was bowed with care and age Till death with coldest diregard Cut off their arguments.

Robert J Burde HIS LECTURE.

"Bob" Burdette, the humorist

ence assembled at Farwell Hall last evening to hear his lecture on "The Pilgrimage of a Funny Man," because it was a large and appreciative one. His style differs somewhat from other popular humorists in that conciousness of wit is depicted on his countenance, and it can be said of him that he laughs at his own jokes. This, however, does not detract from his power, but, on the contrary, the merry twinkle of his eyes and the smile that gatheres on his countenance just as he is about to give utterance the British. They say the Mahdi sent them from Khartoum.

The square reached the Nile at the laughter is contagious, and this
