Seven long years passed swiftly by, and Alex Vernon had reached his twenty-fifth winter. Helen Hawthorne's last words had been to him a prophesy, for she was now on her homeward way, and he had attained the position of head overseer of the works.

"My little sixt made the hort."

"Hold him a minute longer?" she said.

The next a sharp shot rang out on the air, his hands relaxed and the brute fell bleeding at his feet.

He turned toward her.

She was very pale, and the pistol had fallen from her hold, but her eyes were fixed on his hands.

"My little girl made the best se-lection for me after all," Mr. Haw-thorne would often say on receiving congratulations on the efficiency of have saved your life for another scrap or kind message from his daughter's letters; but Alex received them all in silence. He had lost the little golden haired child forever. She would return a woman, grown cold, haughty and proud, perhaps refusing to cast even a smile across the vast gulf yawning between them.

A half-hour later, solied and be grimed, he heard the rustle of a silkent dress and the silvery ripple of worman's laugh.

He glanced up quickly.

A gay party was passing through the works, with one among them seeming a princess surrounded by her followers. The gold still fleck de her hair, and the dark lashes went the cheek of purest ivory. Time had made her more beautiful. She glanced idly indifferently among the little group of men, of which he formed one.
