Beauty and Excellence.

Many persons have the notion that beauty is something entirely spart from excellence or usefulness. However desirable it may be in itself considered to refine and soft-n mankind, it is usually thought of not as an inherent necessity of our nature, and not as an essential part of sound and sterling value, but rather as a felicitoes appendage only to be sought after all useful qualities have been secured. Yet a tener idea of beauty would give it a deeper place both in nature and in art. It is not an after thought, to be taken up or laid aside as opportunity or accident suggests; not a luxury to be postponed until all fancied needs are supplied. It is intimately connected with excellence, and is frequently a tozen of its presence.
