CASABIANUA.

The nigger stood in the cotton patch Whence all but him had fled ; The whiffle-trees and traces flew In circles round his head Yet greasy, sleek and black he stood As born to rule the storm :

A nigger of the blackest blood -A rough, ungainly form. The mule kicked-he would not go Without his master's word; The master, in the grass laid low, His voice no longer heard, He cailed aloud : "Say, massa, say, 'Mus' I let dis mule go."

The master trembled as he lay, And the nigger hallooed whom?" Speak, massa !" once again he cried; "If I may yet be gone?" Naught but the whistling hoofs replied, As fast the mule kicked on. Upon his brow he felt their breath,

He looked from that lone post of death In still, yet brave, despair. He shouted but once more aloud : My golly, must I stay? While o'er him fast a dusty cloud In billows made its way: It hid the nigger from our view

And in his kinky bair ;

And filled his shiny eye : And ruse above the ection, too, Like clouds across the sky. There came at last one monstrous kick-The nigger-where was he "

Ask of those heels that flew so thick, For, alas ! I could not see. The work-bands all returned at last, The mule could not be found; Death held that nigger in his grasp, Half buried in the ground. F. H. Z.
