He commenced his address by speaking of the pleasure it afforded him to appear before a Pittsburgh audience. He reviewed the history of the Republican and Democratic parties, and excused himself for treating of the past on the ground that that period showed what parties amounted to. He analyzed the financial theories and practices of the two parties and devoted a large share of his talk to the discussion of the tariff question. Coming to the present Administration, arraigned it for its false economy and the rushing of the great shipbuilder.

Then he touched on the veto of the 10 pension bills and paid his respects to President Cleveland in no soft terms. In speaking of this he said :- "When the veteran apwith a pension bill in his hand he finds he will have to pass through the pearly gates, not of the New Jerusalem, but of the new Administration. He finds those pearly gates closed to him, and he has to turn away with the 192 votes in his hand."
