A French naval officer, named M. Alfred, Donnalain, has invented an aerial boat, which is to be of immense service during war. Since the last war, when important services were rendered by balloons, the French have gone on I uproving these aerial vessels. Domalin has advanced another step, and, it is said, can guide about his boat balloon through the air, just the same as a boat in the water, and also make it go up and come down at will. In shape it resembles a boat. It is sharp at the prow for cutting through the air, and becomes wider toward the stern. The sails are under the keel, instead of above deck, and are worked like the wings of a bird. It is said to be invaluable to besieged towns and blockaded ports in reconnoitering. Communication may be kept up by telegraph between the occupants of the issat and those below, thus giving all details as to the position of the enemy, Captive balloons may also be sent out from it to survey the field more minutely. Another advantage of the aerial boat will be that an occasional shot from the enemy will not have such disastrous effects upon it as a weight, alum or phosphate providers. Sold only is mus.
