mother used to make them. Her tin cruller box was never empty, and his good were; he the older they were the more he used to make me a boy and a mouse every time he tried crullers and always two for my letters, and she put curaway seed all over mine. I wonder how she did it? That mince pie was good. I think I will take another piece. It hasn't cost anything and it makes me think of old times.

ten years had passed since that time. Peter Perkins is a round, happy man. To see his jolly, benign face glow at you from over his counter makes you involuntarily look round for the other Chesley brother; and now if he were called "Lud and Savionors."

Then Peter Perkins noticed that there was a throng ever increasing and reaching for below them so that the gates had a burden of feet out of sight, and these people came singly to the foot of the Saviour and there laid a gift which was instantly taken by the angels and laid upon a pair of scales, which did not measure by the weight of the gift itself, but the motive which lay like a living heart inside of it.

"Oh, you know what was in the air?" "Think only healthful thoughts." As a man thinketh in his heart, so is he.

been a dream? But it had opened his eyes, and he began to see things as he never had done before. He remembered the mother's teachings, and he slept no more that night. But as soon as daylight dawned he dressed and went to the store where he worked as a clerk.

A little before noon on the 7th of April 1888, Gen. Grant, with his staff, rode into the little town of Farmville, on the south side of the Appomattox river, a town which was memorable as the place in which he opened the correspondence of the Army of Northern Virginia.

As the weather was not very good, the Saviour turned aside from the main street of the village, with a step that seemed elastic as if on the first day of the new world.

"It is a pity," said the banker, "that the banker, but Smith, the street car driver, and I don't see what you come to me for. There is nothing the matter with you, except that you are not a banker."

Such was the opening sentence of Colonel Robert G. Ingersoll's speech at Indianapolis in 1876. Prior to that time he had placed in nomination the Hon. James O. Blaine at Cincinnati. He was then only a lawyer at Peoria and did not possess a national reputation. This speech made him famous before he dreamed of the "Mistakes of Moses" or thought he would be noted as the "boss infidel."

At this time the patient could not speak intelligibly, but he passed over his signs. The throat inside was green with virulent poison, to remove which the doctor left a white powder, one ingredient of which was chlorate of potash; he also prescribed a gargle of alcohol, diluted as little as possible. I have great faith in alcohol as a destroyer of diphtheritic poison.

How to select a wife. Good health, good morals, good sense and good temper, are the four essentials for a good wife. These are the indispensable. After them come the minor advantages of good looks, accomplishments, family position, etc.

There is no better medicine, no greater purifier, no better friend to good health, cleanliness and long life, than sunshine. Where the sun does not shine the doctor must, and the truth condensed in that statement is a whole lecture on health in the home.

Diphtheritic Sore Throat. It is not my intention to treat this dreaded malady, but simply to give an account of my experience as a nurse in an instance which I accompany with some friends during the holidays of last year in a charming country house fitted with all the modern improvements. While there, one of my friends, who, in getting up a Christmas entertainment had over-exerted herself and become de-lirious, took a sudden cold which rapidly developed, with diphtheritic symptoms. Being strong and well, not sensitive about the throat and having no fear of the disease, I volunteered as a nurse. A cathartic was administered and the doctor sent for. I believe that if the bowels had always been moved in the first stages of a heavy cold, diphtheria and pneumonia would be less frequently fatal. When the doctor came the patient was lying on a sofa. He advised her to immediately get to bed, and remain there until he gave her permission to rise. He also suggested isolating the patient from the rest of the household. According to the patient and myself we had secured a suite of rooms consisting of a very large bedroom, (which contained two beds), a bath room and dressing room. There were four large windows in the bedroom, and a window in each of the other rooms. The doctor ordered a counter-irritant for the throat—pork rind, real pepper, whisky, newsholm's. After applying the remedy the patient complained that the grains of pepper made her nervous, and mustard was substituted. This, of course, made the throat more tender, and could be kept on only a few minutes at a time. Then it occurred to me that a thin slice of pork applied to the inflamed throat would soothe and, as a proof, the patient fell asleep soon after it was applied. Upon awaking another mustard plaster took the place of the pork, and so we worked for nearly twenty-four hours. This seems like heroic treatment, but the case was extreme and demanded immediate relief. All this time the patient could not speak intelligibly, but she passed over her signs. The throat inside was green with virulent poison, to remove which the doctor left a white powder, one ingredient of which was chlorate of potash; he also prescribed a gargle of alcohol, diluted as little as possible. I have great faith in alcohol as a destroyer of diphtheritic poison. The patient having and diphtheria. She continued to improve for years previous, understood her condition precisely; she knew that the generally fatal membrane was forming, and realized how necessary it was to aid the doctor and nurse by complying with all their directions. The room we occupied was provided with a cylinder stove, which proved of great service not only in warming the room, but to heat iron which kept the patient's feet warm, to warm everything which she touched, and to burn every handkerchief and towel which she used. When the membrane began to dissolve, the patient expected constantly, and I tore old underclothing into pieces for her use. So completely was the malady of the malignancy of her disease, and of the consequent danger of contagion, that she would not allow me to touch one of those pieces of cloth, but insisted upon having brought to the bedside the fire-shovel, upon which she placed them, and upon which they were thus carried to the stove. The patient was kept up by small drafts of milk, given at frequent intervals when swallowing was possible. After the danger was passed, the sick one being very weak, nervous and disinclined to sleep, the doctor ordered a small morphia pill at night; the next night half a pill, then a quarter, and so on until sleep came naturally. A milk tonic was ordered, and as a diet was provided, and in two weeks my patient was as strong as ever. LILLIAN MAYNE. The Wrong Man Sick. A plainly dressed man, who introduced himself as Mr. John Smith walked into a doctors office, and having explained his symptoms, he asked the doctor how long it would take him to cure him. The doctor, who was introduced by the visitor with every possible courtesy, replied: "You will require seven years' careful treatment under my personal supervision before you are perfectly well; but I think, Mr. Smith, you will be able to resume your labors in about two months." "Doctor, you are fooling yourself. I am an artist, the banker, but Smith, the street car driver, and I don't see what you come to me for. There is nothing the matter with you, except that you are not a banker." A Timely Hint. "Join," she said, as she glanced at the clock, "do you know anything about baseball?" "Well, I rather guess I do," he answered with pride. "There is a short stop in every nine, isn't there?" "Certainly." "Is there a long stop too?" "No." "It is a pity." "Why so?" "Because," and she glanced at the clock again, "if there was a long stop you would make money. Every club would be bidding for you." "Oh woman, woman!" shrieked an orator in a speech the other night, "thou art the light, the life, the salvation of the world! I shouldn't wonder if thou hadst this world's worth of gold and silver, refining, ennobling influence. I bow at thy shrine, acknowledging thy purity and truth. There is nothing so beautiful, so glorious, so true, so perfect, as a woman! I reverence and bow down before thee." And when he went home he said to the woman who was so unfortunate as to be his wife: "Why did you let me die for you? You knew I'd come home half-frozen. You haven't a thought beyond your nose. Sit around and get me a cup of hot tea, can't you? See if you can do that much for a fellow. I'd just like to know what you think when you're good for, any more?" "Has George proposed yet?" "No, but he did the best thing to do last evening." "What did he do?" "He asked me if I thought paragonic injurious to teaching children." The need to ruin—The side door.
