

THE COUNTRY DOCTOR.

In the middle of an old bog, long and narrow, the farmer of the soil having been sucked out by constant cultivation, without rest, without food—literally starved and worn out, just as a man or beast may be by partial treatment—stood a dilapidated log cabin, partially inclosed by a rickety fence, the pickets of which were of unequal length, and here and there leaned in or out, as if about to lay themselves down on the ground, tired by every sway back and forth by every rough wind that blew. In the little square inclosed by this fence were a few colored plants, their lean stalks—like medicine bottles—up to a height of three and four feet with a soft green leaf at the top—having somewhat the appearance of dwarf palm trees; and several rows of dead corn-stalks, around which twined thin, sickly cow-poa vines, like hopeless poverty clinging to the ground.

you must think about yourself a little." "But I hev to mind Tom," she replied irrelevantly. "Don't you know he's my husband?" And the preacher said I must love honor and erby, and as I hev to mind him—don't you see?" This revelation startled the doctor. It had never occurred to him that Standard, who had a mother and sisters moving in the best circles of society—which society he himself had mingled—could have united himself by marriage to a girl; and yet the knowledge of the fact rather raised than lowered the man in his estimation, and at the same time he felt that the girl, poor, friendless, almost outcast as she was, had thrown herself away in marrying him. "When were you and Tom married?" he asked. "Nigh on to a year ago," replied Maggie. "But, oh my! I want to tell, and now I've gone and done it," and she began to cry. "Never mind," said the doctor soothingly, stroking her hair back with her forehead with a gentle hand. "Never mind; you have only told me, and I'll not tell anybody else."

There is considerable discussion going on regarding the necessity for the use of salt for animals. It is believed by many to be a necessity, a belief that has existed from the earliest times. Even Virgil attributed an increased flow of milk to the use of salt, and Plinius, that salt produced more milk and finer cheese. Among the recent writers, Professor James M. Johnson believes that salt assists digestion and the restoring of bodily wear; Professor Vail, that it quickens circulation; Dr. Latham, that it aids lodgment and circulation; Dr. Fiever, that it provokes an increase of muscular strength and to some extent counter-balances the want of sufficient nutrition; Dr. Locelles, that it is as indispensable to man and animals as the air they breathe, because it assists indigestion, aids in the oxidation of blood and the assimilation of food, and is, in reality, an auxiliary to digestion. There is a small percentage of salt in the food consumed, but Professor Arnold states that it is less than in milk, and hence must be supplied. Dr. Dalton, Professor Arnold and Dr. Smith, an English authority, all agree in the necessity for giving salt, which supplies the chlorine and sodium, which are not supplied by the foods consumed, and that animals are kept in a much better condition than when not fed with it.
