went to the bed and sat down on his feet. "Because, I mean to say, if you have come to collect a bill from papa, it's no use; he won't be in for ever long."

and on the poorly dressed, untidy little boy. They were both looking at John's portrait. "Poor papa," said the boy, "but you help him," said the Judge, smiling.

lightning. To nurse grudge is almost as exciting an occupation as to engage in active hostilities. "Ten years ago," muttered the old Judge, with a pang of remorse. He looked at the young man's face, and these words burst from his lips in passionate haste.

The thrifty farmer. The thrifty farmer adopts those rules for the regulation of his business which he strictly observes himself. And these are those around him. If he enforces Do everything in the right time; convert everything to its proper use, and put everything in its proper place, and when not in use, keep it there.

Some horses, instead of refusing to go at all, have a trick of running back when you want to start them. This is a worse fault than that of refusing to go at all, as it is liable to smash the carriage or injure those in it. In such cases the same means as are recommended for those who may be tried. If those fail, take the horse into the middle of an open level field, start him, and let him back as much as he wishes, keeping the wheel turned so as to make the circuit of the field as many times as he wishes. Then make him keep backing until he is heartily sick of it and dizzy. Then he will soon be in the habit of starting when you want to go, and will not be likely to try it again.

Some horses greatly annoy their owners by lying down in the harness, breaking the shafts and doing other mischief. The best way to break them of this trick is to give them an overdose of it. When once they are grounded, stand by their head and neck and make him stay there. He will soon want to get up, but hold him down, keeping his head flat on the ground and holding it there. If you are strong and determined you can keep him down, although it will be lively work for awhile. But don't give up. Keep him down till he is tired out and gives up, if it takes all day, and night, too. When he gives up he knows that he is conquered, and that you are stronger than he. He will not be likely to put himself in a position that will give you a chance to hold him down again.

John looked at his father and burst into tears. His father saw the tears and said, "What's the matter, John? Don't cry. You're a big fellow now, and you ought to be able to take care of yourself. You're a good boy, and you'll be a good man yet. You'll be a good man yet."
