A Chapter of Personal Experi-

No one wants to live on a farm the roll of which has been so worn and neglected that it will not produce enough to furnis's food and supplies for family needs, yet there are hundreds of such farmers in Ohio and in other States. I am now located on just that kind of a farm, of eighty acres, mostly white-mak timbered, white-clay land. The timber was nearly all cut off years ago to enable the former occupants to eke out a scanty

Two years ago last April it became secessary for me to remove to this farm. Having been a farmer and live-stock shipper for twenty years previous and living on good land in a very desirable location, I had contracted debts through my shipping business, and was completemy land, I was jostled out and then succeed at by those who had been benefitted by the sale. When I arrived at this farm, as a last resort. I spent two days in looking over the field, and found more hare ground (slippery white clay) than grassy plots. I had known the farm for many years, but did not think the soil one-half as poor as I found it.

Fourteen acres was in wheat; twentysix acres had been just seeded in timothy and clover one year previous; eight acres was a meadow, including two acres of bottom soil along a small creek which ran across the farm, leaving a bind on woods, pasture and timber. This is the best soil on the farm, the land dipping down into low, swampy patches, which must be disched and tile-drained through some clay knowls before it can be brought under cultivation.
