He could speak English first rate, and having lived among the whites for years had picked up a good many pointers. We soon learned among other things that he could "put up his dukes" in first rate style. In fact, when put against our best man, "Joe," as the Indian was called, knocked him out in the seventh round. We put him on to a few extra dodges, and then waited for the fruit to

A Veteran's Encounter.

Troops were pouring in for the Indian war, and most of them were old vets from the Army of the Potomic. Blost of those were in a great hurry to knock over an Indian, either with fist or bullet, and the half-dozer redskins about the fort had to battle to save their bucon. A recent Columbus dispatch stated We extract the following from the last One day when the sign was right, we togged Joe out in true Indian style, gave ninute it was proposed to get up a mili between him and the Indian he jumped · ivar off the ground and yelled :
