—THE— WHITE IS KING OF SEWING MACHINES.

It was Crowned so when it took the First Premium at the Cincinnati Centennial in 1888, at the Great Contest, but more so when it took the GOLD MEDAL At the Universal Exhibition at Paris, France, in 1889, for being the Best Family Sewing Machine In the world. It is applauded as such by the 800,000 Sold since its introduction in 1877 Its superiority is acknowledged, though with many regrets, by thousands who had bought other new SEWING MACHINES Before they had seen the merits of the WHITE

Ladies will find it greatly to their advantage to examine the merits of "THE WHITE" before buying a Sewing Machine. "THE BEST IS ALWAYS CHEAPEST" in the end. An inferior Sewing Machine is a poor investment at any price.

Good News!

No one, who is willing to adopt the right course, need be long afflicted with boils, carbuncles, pimples, or other cutaneous eruptions. These are the results of Nature's efforts to expel poisonous and effete matter from the blood, and show plainly that the system is ridding itself through the skin of impurities which it was the legitimate work of the liver and kidneys to remove. To restore these organs to their proper functions, Ayer's Sarsaparilla is the medicine required. That no other blood-purifier can compare with it, thousands testify who have gained Freedom from the tyranny of depraved blood by the use of this medicine. "For nine years I was afflicted with a skin disease that did not yield to any remedy until a friend advised me to try Ayer's Sarsaparilla. With the use of this medicine the complaint disappeared. It is my belief that no other blood medicine could have effected so rapid and complete a cure."—Andres D. Garcia, C. Victoria, Tamaulipas, Mexico. "My face, for years, was covered with pimples and humors, for which I could find no remedy till I began to take Ayer's Sarsaparilla. Three bottles of this great blood medicine effected a thorough cure. I confidently recommend it to all suffering from similar troubles."—M. Parker, Concord, Vt.,

INSIGHT.

On the river of life as I float along,
I see with the spirit's sight
That many a nameless weed of wrong
Has root in a seed of right;
For evil is good that has gone astray,
And sorrow is only blindness,
And the world is always under the sway
Of a changeless law of kindness.

The commonest error a truth can make
In shouting its sweet voice hoarse,
And sin is only the soul's mistake
In misdirecting its force:
And love, the fairest of all fair things
That ever to men descended,
Grows rank with nettles and poisonous things
Unless it is watched and tended.

There could not be anything better than this
Old world in the way it began,
Although some matters have gone amiss
From the great original plan;
And however dark the skies may appear,
And however soul's may blunder,
I tell you it all will work out clear,
For good lies over and under.

—Ella Wheeln Wilcox.

LOUISE'S FLIRTATION.

The reader is introduced to the little village of Waltham, on the Cornish coast. It was mainly inhabited by fishermen, who, with their families, occupied the row of unpretentious cottages that lined the single street leading up from the beach. Leaning upon the rude gate in front of one of these cottages, with the deepening twilight throwing weird shadows around her, stood Louise Martin, the beauty and pet of Waltham.

"Have you ever looked at a face till it haunted you?" asks a writer. Have you ever seen the face of one, it may be, who was an utter stranger to you, yet that seemed to fill your mind with a sort of recognition that sent you out over a sea of speculation, wondering where you had seen it before, or when you would see it again? The eyes talk to you, and lips tell you a dreamy story."

Such was the beauty of this rustic belle.

Louise's father was a fisherman of the better class, having accumulated what to his modest ambition seemed a competency. It was natural that the daughter should have many suitors, and that adulation should have slightly inflated her rustic vanity, but altogether she was as lovable as she was pretty.

As Louise stood leaning upon the gate, Will Hatfield, her reported sweetheart, approached. With lover-like familiarity he stole upon her, caught her in a vigorous hug, and left a kiss upon her red lips.

"Stop, Will!" exclaimed the beauty. "You mustn't do that."

"Why not, I'd like to know?" returned Will. "I've done it often enough before now, and you didn't object. Come, now, Louise, don't scowl so—give a fellow a smile."

The smile was not forthcoming at his bidding. A decided pout was visible instead.

"I know what it is," and now Will scowled blackly himself. That London chap, that Charles Stanford, has turned you against me. You're dazzled with the notice he has taken of you; but let him look out for himself. If he comes between you and I there'll be something bad come of it. Mark what I say!"

With this threat Will strode angrily away, unheeding Louise's recall. His anger frightened her a little, and she really loved the stalwart, handsome young fisherman. She had meant no unfaithfulness by receiving the pronounced attentions of Charles Stanford, a chance visitor to the village; but his fine clothes, cultivated airs and contrast to the rough exterior of her lover had slightly dazzled her. Now, however, the words that Will had spoken had excited her spirit of opposition, and she resolved to continue the pleasant flirtation as long as possible. Therefore, when Stanford called the same evening he found her all smiles and coquettish airs. They parted finally at the gate with a kiss—a kiss that made Will's blood boil to see and hear, as he had been watching less than twenty feet away.

As Stanford walked down the street to the little tavern where he was stopping Will half resolved to kill him on the way and only repressed the murderous desire by a violent effort. He slept little that night, but lay awake thinking of his trouble. He would marry no flirt, he resolved, though giving Louise up caused him great pain. He could not help loving her; but it was better, he thought, to suffer for a time than to link his fortune with one to whom he could not devote his whole life. In this frame of mind he sat in his fishing boat for his day's labor.

There were other boats in company with him, and the day being favorable, they soon filled their boats. They then returned to the village; but Will, dreading to go home, making fast his boat to the shore and getting out, he clambered up the hill and sat down near the opening of one of those little caves that are very common among the cliffs on the shore. These grottoes seem almost to have been made by the hands of fairies, they are so beautiful and brilliant inside, the ceiling hanging in pearly crystals which flicker and glimmer in the faint light; sea-weeds hang around, and the sand on the floor is full of tiny, sparkling shells.

It was near one of these beautiful grottoes that will seated himself and watched the boats returning home. As he sat thinking—for the splashing of the waves did not disturb him—he thought he heard the sound of a voice, evidently in the cave; he remembered an interview he had witnessed a few nights before and a sign arose, which he could not repress.

"I won't disturb them—they are lovers," he said to himself. "I am sure I heard the sound of a kiss. Ah, well! I hope they will be happier than I am."

Will sat there a long time; he did not think how long until the setting sun reminded him that it was time to return. The tide began to rise and the spray to foam, it almost touched his feet. At high tide the cave was entirely under water. Will was well acquainted with the place, so he prepared to go. As he was going up the hill he remembered the lovers in the cave.

"I suppose they don't think about the tide," said Will. Then, going within a few steps of the cave, he cried:

"Hallo, friends! The tide's rising, and you must leave!"

Scarcely had he uttered these words before a cry, half stifled as it was uttered, struck on his ear.

Will gave a start. He rushed madly into the cave, and in another instant he was at its mouth, bearing in his arms—Louise. No one followed them out of the cave, and the waves now were licking the smooth sand on its floor. With desperate strength Will bore Louise up the rocky path, out of the reach of the tide; then, setting her down on her feet, he pushed her from him, and pointed, with an imperative gesture toward the village. Without a word she went on her way, while Will, his hands clasped tightly over his breast, his lips strongly compressed, stood gazing after her.

Then, drawing a blood-stained knife from his bosom, he threw it as far as he could into the sea.

"Charles Stanford will never part lovers again!" he muttered, savagely.

Unfastening the boat from its moorings he hoisted the sail, and soon reached the village.

How Lou reached home she scarcely knew; but having arrived there, she found herself, from excitement, to be obliged to go to bed. She said nothing about the day's event, and it was not until nearly a week later that inquiries as to Charles stanford began to be made. His disappearance had not at first caused much remark, he being a total stranger to everybody in the village.

In the meantime Will had visited the cave, and found it empty. The tide, he concluded, had carried the body out to sea.

One day, just as search for the missing man had began to excite interest, a body was washed ashore near the village. It was decomposed to a degree, past recognition, but there existed no doubt in the minds of the fishermen as to its identity. Then inquiries were instituted, Louise was compelled at last to tell what she knew, and the excitement culminated in Will Hatfield's arrest. He was taken to the county jail some twenty miles distant, awaiting his trial.

In the interim Louise, whose heart bled for her lover, and whose imagination found excuse in his love of her for his terrible crime, visited him often in his cell, and Will, repentant of his mad, murderous folly, forgave her inconstancy, and took her to his heart again. Louise volunteered to absent herself, or to refuse to speak at the trial, but Will would not allow it. He neither denied nor admitted his guilt, but resolved to abide by the result unflinchingly.

On the morning of the trial—a rainy, dismal morning in January—a dense crowd surged about the Assize Court long before the hour for the proceeding to begin. Belief in the prisoner's guilt was almost universal. Consequently, having heard and accepted this theory, the public mind was very bitter against the prisoner; and on the morning of the trial there were hundreds of anxious spectators, eager to get a glimpse of the young man's face. They counted on seeing quite a ferocious and dangerous-looking person, and were disappointed when at last the young man, with his fine, genial face, walked up between the two officers and took his place in the dock. There was a general murmur of dissatisfaction. Was that the man? Any other person in the court looked more like a murderer. But they had made up their minds to believe in his guilt, and they saw no reason for changing their opinion. They tried to shudder, and look very much horrified as they looked into his brave, handsome face. They had scarcely ever enjoyed such a rare excitement before, and they could not refrain from gloating over it.

The trial lasted only a day, the principal witness being Louise, whose faltering words unwillingly told the story of her lover's guilt. The jury were out less than an hour, and returned with a verdict of "Guilty" against the prisoner.

Just here, however, something occurred that put a different face upon the matter. Something so novel and romantic, so like what they had read in the story-books, that the crowd went wild with excitement. No less a person than the supposed murdered man entered the court alive!

He advanced towards the bench, and the centre of all eyes, spoke a few minutes with the Judge and then to the counsel for the prosecution. After which amid the most breathless stillness the Judge said:

"Mr. Stanford states that he was injured by the prisoner, but, as we all see not fatally. He escaped drowning by climbing up the rocky side of the cave and left the vicinity quietly upon the tide going down. Wishing to avoid further trouble, he has absented himself; but upon learning that the prisoner was being tried for murder he has come here to make his statement. He does not desire to prosecute the prisoner for the murderous assault, and therefore the prisoner is discharged."
