SOME REASONS

Many things combine during this month to throw all the benefits in the way of the buyer. Odd Lots—Broken Assortments. Too much of one thing. Too little of another.

Preparation for Annual Inventory.

End of one season, beginning of another. General clearing up, are some reasons for this

SACRIFICE SALE.

A reckless sacrificing of prices—dividing them in most cases by 2. All double width Imported Wool Dress Fabrics now at most favorable prices:

Cough-Cures

Are abundant; but the one best known for its extraordinary anodyne and expectorant qualities is Ayer's Cherry Pectoral. For nearly half a century this preparation has been in greater demand, than any other remedy for colds, coughs, bronchitis, and pulmonary complaints in general.

"I suffered for more than eight months from a severe cough accompanied with hemorrhage of the lungs and the expectoration of matter. The physicians gave me up, but my druggist prevailed on me to try

Ayer's Cherry Pectoral.

I did so, and soon began to improve; my lungs healed, the cough ceased, and I became stouter and healthier than I have ever been before. I would suggest that the name of Ayer's Cherry Pectoral be changed to Elixir of Life, for it certainly saved my life."—F. J. Olden, Salto, Buenos Ayres.

"A few years ago I took a very bad cold, which settled on my lungs. I had night sweats a racking cough, and great soreness. My doctor's medicine did me no good. I tried many remedies, but received no benefit; everybody despaired of my recovery. I was advised to use Ayer's Cherry Pectoral, and, as a last resort, did so. From the first dose I obtained relief, and, after using two bottles of it, was completely restored to health."—F. Adams, New Grenc, N. J.

PERPLEXITY.

I know a charming little maid,
With soft brown eyes, and hair
Of just the very loveliest shade—
In short, supremely fair.
She won my heart long, long ago,
And knows it, there's no doubt,
But when I try to tell her so,
She laughs, and says, "Get out!"

Of course I know she doesn't mean
That she wants me to go.
Her curt reply ex presses in-
Credulity, I know;
And yet it bothers me, you see,
When I would talk about
My love—she's all the world to me—
To hear her say, "Get out!"

Some day, I know, I shall persuade
Her that I really mean
All that I say; that I have laid
My life before my queen;
And oh! I wonder night and day
Harrassed by dreadful doubt,
If when that time comes she will say
In soberness, "Get out!"

—Somerville Journal

A BROKEN LOVE.

BY MRS. A. E. BAER.

One fine morning in the spring, ten years ago, there came up to my room with my French rolls and chocolate a dainty little pink note. I was certainly astonished in a mild way at its early advent, but I knew the writer, and was by no means seriously curious.

"Ellen is in some dreadful distress about some dressmaker, or exercised about her spring shopping," I said, "and it can wait, for I am particular about a few things, and a calm, deliberate breakfast is one of them.

So I laid the note aside and took up the morning paper. Having finished both breakfast and newspaper, I took up Ellen's note with that feeling of reluctance with which we come back from great emotions to the small, selfish concerns of our own everyday life.

The note, for once, was full of real, earnest feeling, and roused both my sympathy and curiosity, though it contained only these few lines:

DEAR SARAH: Come to me at once. I am in great trouble about Alice.

Yours, etc.,
ELLEN TRAVEEN.

"About Alice!"

I speculated now with a very grave interest. Alice Traveen was very dear to me, and I dressed myself in haste, and went at once to relieve the curiosity that had now become anxiety.

I found Ellen nursing her trouble in the most elegant of morning dresses, and with the most dismal of faces. Yet somehow the tone and atmosphere of the house had quite dispelled the fears that had hurried both my hands and my feet for the last hour, for I heard Alice taking her singing lesson, and Maud had kissed me in the hall with all her usual joyous abandon.

"Some love affair," I now decided, and I was not wrong.

Ellen was feeling herself to be the most injured and miserable of mothers. Alice had had two offers, and had madly refused the chance of becoming Mrs. Van Slogen, and accepted the modest destiny that a young captain of artillery could give her.

"And, my dear Sarah, he is under orders to join the army now, and he and Alice want to be married at once, and the girl has not a dress fit to be seen, and there is no time to arrange anything decently; and, upon the whole, it is the most dreadful affair."

"And what does William say about it?" She looked at me indignantly.

"Now, Sarah, what do you expect that William would say? You know how full of dreams and crochets he always is. He says, of course, 'Let the young ones have their way: that young Eldridge is a fine, noble-hearted fellow; and that any dress Alice has is nice enough to be married in.'"

"Well, Ellen, I think myself that young Eldridge is in every way Alice's equal; the family is certainly a very estimable one."

"Oh, dear me, Sarah! that is not the question. Sack Eldridge is poor! I don't care for family, and that kind of nonsense. Van Solgen is rich and has an establishment, and everything respectable. Nancy Alice Traveen following the drum in a baggage wagon! And William never will see these things in a proper light. I don't see what can be done to save Alice if you go against her, too."

"My dear Ellen, I am not against the child; you know how dearly I love her. But this Van Solgen had a very bad name about his first wife."

"His first wife! Why, Sarah, she had not a particle of style! How could a man respect a woman who neither knew how a dinner or a lady ought to be dressed? If, under such circumstances, he lost his temper, I think he ought to be excused for it. Now, Alice knows how to manage both cooks and dressmakers; and, between you and me, my dear, they manage the world."

"I have heard, too, that with all his wealth this Van Solgen is really very stingy."

"Stingy! And he has got the dearest little cottage at Newport, and the finest establishment in the city. I think it is a shame for people to say such things. Two such houses as Van Solgen owns ought certainly to cover a multitude of sins."

"But two houses can't make the child happy if she does not love the man."

"Then she is very unreasonable, and she ought to be made to behave herself."

And so she was. Poor Jack Eldridge went off the next week to his corps, looking dark and hopeless enough; and Alice came oftener than ever to see me, and wept and complained passionately at her and Jack's disappointment. I respected and sympathized with her. Twenty years before I had had my own little dream of love (which had not come true), and so I was quite able to speak with authority on its uncertainty and instability.

Then as the summer ripened, I went to my pleasant Jersey farm, and the Traveens went to Saratoga. With what subtle tact Ellen laid her plains, and with what patient, indomitable industry she worked them, I know not; but the fall brought her reward. For though listless and indigerent about many grave things, she was a consummate tatician where fashion or worldly advancement was in question; so I was by no means surprised when I read in the papers the announcement of the contemplated marriage between Arthur Van Solgen and Alice Reid Traveen.

Not surprised, but still very sorry, and the more so when I saw Alice's listless looks and variable temper. However, if jewelry and dry goods had any compensating power, she had her consolation.

Mr. Traveen was not satisfied. "I do not like this marriage, Sarah," he said to me one night, as we sat alone over the drawing-room fire, waiting for Mrs. Traveen and her daughters. "Van is not the kind of man I should have thought Alice would have chosen, and I would much rather have had Jack Eldridge for a son-in-law—that is, if Alice must marry at all."

"O, I suppose she must marry; Ellen thinks she has no time to lose."

"And the child is not twenty until next March. That is what troubles me. Between the nursery and the school-room and the visiting since, I really have not had time to get acquainted with my own daughter—and I do think I should like her beauty and accomplishments to adorn my own home a little while before she is given to some fellow that is almost a stranger to me."

"But Ellen is quite satisfied, she says, with Mr. Van Solgen's character and position."

"That is what amazes me. If God Almighty, who gave the dear child, had asked for her again, and there was to be a burial instead of a wedding, you would see Ellen almost frantic. But here comes a man about whom she knows nothing, except that he is rich, and was not happy with his first wife; and she strives with things impossible in order to give her child to him. I must say I deprecate the whole transaction."

"Why do you not speak to Alice then?"

"I do, whenever I have an opportunity; but she says as she could not have Jack Eldridge, it is perfectly indifferent to her whom she marries; and that, as she cannot please herself, she may as well please her mother."

Christmas holidays passed, and soon after them in all the pomp of lace, and satin, and diamonds, Alice became Mrs. Van Solgen. Whatever might be the result of this marriage, I had no sympathy with Alice. Much as her mother was to blame, I thought her equally weak and false—for had she been determined to be true to Jack, her father and sister and the better part of her friends would have encouraged and supported her. And I do not believe that any woman can fall publicly from truth and honestly until she has already fallen from her nobler self in the secrecy of her own heart.

Alice knew I disapproved the course she had taken, so our intercourse gradually assumed a very ceremonious character. About four months after her marriage, I went early one morning to Mrs. Traveen's to ask Maud to go shopping with me. Maud was at her sister's, and as I wished to see Alice before I left the city for the summer, I drove there for her.

I interrupted a sisterly quarrel, and Maud, with flashing eyes and burning cheeks, said "she was glad I had come, and that she would be ready to go with me in half an hour." Alice offered no explanation, but sat with a moody face folding and unfolding a newspaper she held in her hand.

Her manner was so peculiar that I said, a little haughtily: "I hope I shall not be in the way for half an hour, Alice."

"No," she answered pettishly. "You can stay, and scold, too, if you like; that seems to be every one's mission to me."

I saw that she was in one of those sullen, reckless moods of selfishness that occur only where a supreme sense of some fancied or real wrong has obliterated for the time all conventional regards. But before I could reply Mr. Van Solgen came in. It amazed me to see how timid and nervous this man had become. Alice ruled him absolutely. No slave ever trembled before a tyrant as did this proud man before the cold, scornful beauty he called "his wife."

Punishment is lame, but it comes. The measure he had meted out to his first wife was meted back to him by his second. As he had slighted her love, and received with cold indifference all her efforts to win and please him, so now Alice slighted him, and took with polite apathy his most tender attentions and magnificent presents.

He wanted to know her plans for the day. She "did not have any." Could he get her anything she desired down town? "No; she had more than she wanted." What arrangements should he make for their summer trip? "All places were alike to her." He wandered from window to window, made little jokes which she suffered to fall to the ground without any pretense of responding to them. Finally, under cover of my presence, he assumed a bravery he was far from feeling, and said:

"You are not well, darling, this morning. Take good care of yourself, for I must leave you for a few hours; so kiss me good-bye."

She looked at him with contemptuous indifference, and simply answered: "I am quite well, and you know it." Then she offered him a kiss, with an air that would have daunted any man who knew that he had a right to take it.

My visit was a very unpleasant one, although Alice relented and apologized somewhat before I left. A great pity filled my heart for this wife so loved and petted; and inexplicable as it may seem, I could not think nor speak of her but as "Poor Alice!"

I found out from Maud the cause of the special ill-temper I had just witnessed. Jack Eldridge had made himself famous by some act of daring courage and gallantry, and the papers were full of his praises. Alice, quite unused to self-control, had spoken words concerning him which Maud considered Mrs. Van Solgen ought not to have spoken, and, while they were on the subject of conjugal duties, Maud had also remonstrated with her on her unnecessary scorn of a husband so kind to her.

I did not call on Alice for some time again, and then circumstances took me out of New York until the close of the war. At first I corresponded regularly with Mrs. Traveen; but in the voyage of life friendships drift apart and, as my absence lengthened, my correspondence died out.

Judge, therefore, of my surprise on my return to New York, five years after Alice's marriage, to find her a widow with one child.
