Danger From Lightning.

Very many people suffer seriously from their ungovernable fear of lightning. It is not unreasonable to fear the lightning stroke. Its sudden visitation is well calculated to excite alarm, and its often serious and sometimes fatal injuries to life and property intensify apprehen-

This is the season when thunder storms are usually most frequent and severe, and every reasonable precaution should be taken to protect both life and property from the lightning stroke. Especially should barns be carefully pro. tected, as the gasses caused by new crops packed in the mows are highly inflammable, and instantaneous combustion often follows an electrical discharge on or near a barn. Barns are also more exening nervine, imparting tone and posed because of the general absence of vigor to the whole system. It's a have been saved from a discharge of electhe trees around them. Many houses tricity by the close proximity of high sician, and adapted to woman's deli- trees. Indeed, there is almost entire cate organization. If it fails to give tions, there is really very little danger to satisfaction, in any case for which any building that is protected by proper sour or ferment in the stomach away from the building. It is safe and cause distress. As peculiar in to say that one-half, and probably much more than one-half, of the lightning rods put up in the country are seriously defective and frauds upon the people who have bought them. Many buildings have vastly more feet of rod on them than are needed if properly applied, and few who buy rods know when they are properly put upon the buildings or when they are properly grounded in moist earth. The best conductor when properly applied to a building is only an increased source of peril unless it is grounded where there is constant moist-

> The best lightning conductor is the copper cable. It is more costly than iron, but it is well worth the difference. The conducting power of a rod is the extent of surface it presents, and a cable made up of many strands of wire greatly multiplies its surface and conqueting capacity. Then copper is the best con ductor of all our cheap metals, and lightning always follows the best conductor. It plays no "freaks." It is often apparently erratic in its course, but it always obeys the laws of attraction, and a copper cable, with a circuit around the base of the whole roof, with points attached to every chimney or prominent elevation, with two or three conductors to the earth, ending in a cistern, water-pipe or moist ground, will be reasonably certain to protect any building and is inmates from the lightning stroke.

In the absence of conductors to protect a house, and indeed under all circumdamp currents during a thunder storm. As all currents of air are heavily charged with dampness during such sterms, they become conductors of lightning in the absence of stronger attraction, such as a good lightning rod; and even with good lightning rods, the possibility of an exessive discharge of electricity that would make part of it seek other conuctors, is a strong argument in favor of closed doors and windows during electrical disturbances. It is seldom that s ARTISTIC JOB PRINTING lightning stroke enters a house at all, unless by some damp air current caused by an open door or window, or by a chimney. Many buildings receive electric strokes without penetrating the inside at all and without even serious shock > to the inmates. Few of the very many who are terrorized by thunder storms pause to consider how little loss of life is caused by lightning strokes. There are many more people drowned each year than are killed by lightning; there are a great many more people killed by railroad accident more people killed by the varied accidents which prevail in even the best regplated communities, than by lightning. None are terrorized by fear of drowning: hundreds of thousands travel daily on railways without fear, and none take thought of the countless forms in which death comes by accident everywhere; but all more or less bow to fear of lightning, that is not nearly as destructive of life as other sources of danger which give them little or no concern. There is danger in the thunder storm, however, and it is always wise to take every reasonable precantion against it. Good lightning rods are always wise, and there is always wisdom in closed doors and DRUGS AND MEDICINES windows, and always foolhardy exposure in taking refuge unper isolated trees dur-
