"Tickets, please," said the conductor of a train on a line running east out of Detroit, as he entered the car. There was a veey general response in the shape of pasteboard until he came to a farmer who was very earnestly looking out of the window. "Tickets, please," said the conductor.

The man paid no attention. "I'll take your ticket, if you please." The man looked up at him. "Han't got any," he answered slowly.

"Well, the money then. Where are you going ?" "Han't got any money."

"Well, then, what are you on here for? If I don't get either money or ticket I must put you off the train." "You wouldn't stop an express train

"Certainly. Ticket or money." After another look the man shook his head. "Let her go, captain."

The conductor pulled the rope. The air-brakes scrunched and the train came to a stop. The man stepped off, and then handing the conductor a bit of pasteboard said :
