A Tale of the Strike.

A Woman's Confession -Last Monday or Tuesday-I don't remember datesmy husband came home from the workbench and said the carpenters had gone out on a strike. We have not been long married, I didn't know anything about the meaning of "a strike." He told me how the men would succeed, and how he would soon be at work again getting more money and working fewer hours, so that he would have time to read the newspapers in the morning like a business man, he said, and how he would get home earlier in the afternoon. so that I would not have to be in the kitchen until 8 or 9 o'clock at night. It was such a pretty picture that I cried n the fullness of my heart. It seems to have been foreordained that a woman should cry in dispair and joy as well. I den't know why, After he had finished telling me what the outcome would be somebody knecked at the door, I had just dried my cheeks with my apron. I answered the knock. Several strange men came in. My husband introduced them as "the boys." They all talked about the outcome of the strike. They seemed to be so happy that I went out into the kitchen, and like a little fool I cried again. Then my bushand came out and put his arms around me and kissed me, just as he used to do when we were courting. Then he said there was night and he must go. It was part of the strike he said. And he asked me if I hadn't saved up some money in a little bank which he had bought for me last Christmas. I was his Banker. How happy I was to tell him I had saved something and I went and got it and opened it, and the pennies and nickles and dimes, and even a few quarters, rolled out in my lap. I don't know how much there was ; we didn't count it. He took it, saving he might need it at the meeting and that when the strike was over and he got more money he would have to buy two banks in which to keep his money. How many Pisgalis there are in this wolr dfrom which one gets glimpses of sweet fields beyond the swelling flood ! He went out with "the boys," and I went about my work. I wonder which was the merrier, I or the teakettle, which
