A typical teacher has a reverence for right and a hatred for wrong, and he so instills it in the minds of his pupils. He should be a perfect scholar in what he attempts to teach and elucidate, well versed in current events of the day, as well as past history. He will be prompt in all his actions, pushing his energies, intellectually and physically, to the two great ends of school-work -- education and government, prompt to chastise and correct when a general rule and regulation is violated. The copy of the youths of our country must be a calin, moral, selfpossessed being, not given too much to the excitement and gayeties of the natural world, but he must know his sphere at all times, all places, and under all cir-

The man who has an interest in his vocation, teaching, will associate with his scholars frequently on the playground. Let me urge and advise that there is not a place within the limits of the teacher's jurisdiction that is more favorable for learning the nature of the children than on the playground. Here are exhibited their habits, their disposition, their morality and their skill and talent. Again, I remark, that an individual that hopes to achieve success in the art of teaching must be a thoughtful, inventive, wideawake individual - thinking and contemplating, conceiving and persevering to bring the best out of everything and to grasp the scepter in all contemplations. An instructor should be a true psychologist, understanding the nature of his pupils. The instructor that understands the mental state of his pupils will work to a greater advantage than the one who is ignorant of the mental powers of his

The model teacher will have good order in the schoolroom, not exclusively by threats or a display of physical force, but by instilling an interest into the minds of the children. The responsibilities of the teacher are many, and he should realize the duty that rests upon him, and that he is engazed in a grand, noble and immortal work-shaping and moulding immortal mluds for their eternal destiny. We may work upon stone-it will perish; we may work upon metal-time will efface it; wo may build monuments-they will crumble to dust; we may work upon immortal minds, instill them with a jest knowledge and education, and we sculpture something on these tablets that will shine and brighten through all eternity.

night. Nancy Sharp, a colored woman, thirty-two years old, died suddenly, The body was removed to the morgue and shortly afterward it transpired that the woman's life was insured for $500. Almos at the same moment a theory of foul play became current, and Dr. William N. Brennan was sent for to make an official autopsy. As a result of this the cause of the woman's death was given as congestion of the membrane of the brain, resulting form the extraordinary thickness of the skull. At the forehead the skull was about one inch thick and it gradually increased until at the back of the bend it attained a thickness of nearly one and a half inches.
