Pasquale was his name. He was a little devil, that boy. At least the people of the Bend said so after the episode of Keg alley. He had never seen the skies of Italy, but Camilin, his sister, was born there. That was before his father killed the policeman, and long before his mother went to live in Keg alley. He was only 7, but he knew what it meant for a woman in the

Pasquale sat upon the curb with a swarm of other humans and listened. His garments were entirely appropriate to the sultry midsummer night. His ragged little shirt was supplemented by trousers once worn by Uncle Dominico, who kept the fish-stall at the corner. Their legs shortened by the scissors, and worn by Pasquale, they had really quite the grand air. In one skinny arm he clutched close to his breast the sickly, sored-eyed kitten which was alread a

The Letter of Acceptance.

From the Chicago Inter Ocean, It hardly seems possible that any American citizens with brains and persistence enough to take in President Harrison's letter of acceptance can fail to be proud of the fact that the writer of that letter is at the head of our National Government. It is absolutely without a parallel in the annals of American politics, We have had in the country great state papers upon a large variety of occrsions, but, now, for the first time in our Nationtional history, there appears above the waves a letter of acceptance which is a masterpiece. Who ever thinks of going back to or quoting with pride any previous letter of acceptance? All served their purpose and were soon lost to view. The first sea that was high enough to wear a white cap passed over the best of them and it was no longer remembered. But waves may dash against this towering,
