The Secretary of the baby which yesterday moralog came to cheer him in his old age.

We started out to speak of Mr. Jones' prowess as a swimmer, for as such he excels, and it was in a conversation about the old days that we drew from him the substance for what appears below.

Mr. Jones was born with a liking for water and is still a strong temperance man. At an early age he went to sea, and for several years was a suilor. He is not the man who umped overboard from a swift steamer, in the middle of the ocean unknown to the crew, and, after playing around for an hone or two, caught up with the ship before it reached port; but when his vessel was at anchor be often "took a beader" and dived into the b'us and bring deep a hundred feet or so, and then, coming up for ozone, disported among the fishes far as long as two hours at a time swimming miles, forth and back, before returning to the ship.

Mr. Jones' reputation as a swimmer and diver was so well known, and he had given such frequent exhibitions of his skill after coming to live here, that impossible stories were sold about what he could do in that line, and he once engaged in a bit of barmless deception which many who saw or heard of his "wonderful leat" may not to this day know was only "one of his tricks." Mr. Jones was one of a crowd who were hallot, declares to the judge of election that
