"Talking about whiskey," said a mild only upon perscription of his physician, one evening recently in the presence of a HERALD reporter, "it is generally known that intoxicants can be manufactured out of anything from rye to the printed labels on tomato cans. but it remained for a citizen of Someret county to distill whiskey from huckleberries. A good many years ago there lived in the mountain above Salisbury a German named Miller, who following the custom of those degenerate days built a small distillery close by his home. It happened one season that there was an abundant crop of buckleberries and Miller's wife and children gathered a number of bushes of the little blue, woody fruit. The economical housewife carefully placed the barries in the old fashioned bakeoven to dry, thinking to convert them into Ladies Silk Waists and pies during the winter months. Her husband came across the dried fruit one day and conceived the idea of distilling it Into "the stuff that cheers."
