When old Mr. Johnson came back to England and died, after 15 years' moneymaking in South America, he bequeathed to his son Saul not only a comfortable competency, but a handsome advertisement, which at once rescued the young man from the obscurity in which he had previously languished. Among the treasures which Mr. Johnson brought home was a magnificent collection of unmounted Brazillian dimonds. It was the shock camed by an andacious attempt to steal these stones which immediately brought about the old gentleman's death. The news of this sensational event going the rounds of the papers, young Saul, as the new possessor of the gems, awake literally one morning to find himself famous. He was interviewed, and paragraphed, pulled for a full nine days, and by the end of that time had arrived at the conclusion that he was a prominent personage in society.
