BABY WHITE.

My baby white will sleep to night,
I had no more of that little noise,
No more his tired little noise,
I heard both night and day;
The little cradle empty stands,
The tiny hand, warm and red,
And the mother's arms, O' aching arms!
Are empty, empty, too.

O, little half-oped bow, how sweet
The fragrance that you shed,
You do not heed the tears that fall
Upon your low green bow,
Like rain pressed out from wounded hearts,
From whence all joy has fled.

You are not there; your angel wings
Brush soft your mother's face,
Your arms about her neck are wound,
You lie in your embrace;
O not afar! Close, close to her,
That is your dwelling place.

A RETIRED BUSINESS WOMAN.

A Page From Her History.

The important experiences of others are interesting. The following is no exception: "I had been troubled with neuralgia 25 years, much of that time very seriously. For five years I was confined to my bed almost continuously. I was in business, but obliged to retire on account of my condition. My feet and limbs were badly swollen, and I was unable to walk. I had been advised by a physician to try Hood's Sarsaparilla, and I purchased a bottle of the same. I had not taken more than a few doses when I felt a sudden change in my condition. I was able to get up and walk, and my feet and limbs were no longer swollen. I had been advised by a physician to try Hood's Sarsaparilla, and I purchased a bottle of the same. ARTISTIC JOB PRINTING

A SPECIALTY.

HARRY M. BENSHOFF,

MANUFACTURING STATIONER

AND

BLANK BOOK MAKER.

MANNAN BLOCK,
JOHNSTOWN, PA.

"Will you please direct me to Mr. Benshoff's residence?" he asked of the station agent as soon as he stood upon the platform.

"His house is over there," answered the young man, nodding to the only low residence in the little town, situated on a small hill a short distance from the depot, "but there is no one there now; everybody in town is out in the woods hunting for that girl."

"Is she lost—Miss Brayton?" gasped Arthur.

"They say that she is."

"How did it happen? Tell me quick!"

"Why, you see, the ladies went out horseback riding last night about ten o'clock and Miss Brayton's horse took fright and ran into the woods with her on its back. Mr. Bentley and some men followed her as quickly as possible, and after while they came upon the horse eating grass and she was nowhere to be seen. They came back and organized a hunt. They've been out all night and had not found her when last heard from."

"Oh, my poor Grace," groaned Arthur.

"Please tell me how I can find the men and I'll go and help them," he added, to the agent.

"Oh, go, too, in a minute," the young man responded, hastening back to his office as the train moved away from the station. As they hurried away he handed Arthur a ball of twine.

"Put that in your pocket," he said; "you may need it. When a fellow gets in the woods he's liable to lose his bearings and not be able to tell the points of the compass or anything, so we generally bring some string to use for a guide whenever we go off the regular beat."

Arthur took the twine mechanically and they soon reached the edge of the woods. Here they found Mrs. Bentley, surrounded by a group of sympathizing women, crying and reproaching herself by turns for having allowed Grace to ride that particular horse. Finding only a moment to greet her, Arthur and the agent hurried in the direction she told him. Mr. Bentley and the men had taken, and in an hour or two came upon them as they had passed for a party in a slightly open space.

"Denton, old boy, how did you happen to come?" exclaimed Mr. Bentley, springing forward to meet Arthur as he was his approach.

"I came on the morning train and inquired for you, and the agent told me what had happened."

"Well, we are doing all we can for you."

"Then, in a few words, he detailed the plan of the hunt, asking Arthur if he had any suggestions to offer. The theory of the men was working on that Grace had either jumped or been thrown from her horse unhurt and had then started to return to the village, but, missing her way, was still wandering in the forest."

"She had been hurt, they argued, she would have found near the horse or along the path between him and the village. Arthur had no suggestions to make, but was anxious to be at work, so he fell into the party assigned him, and the whole party moved on, occasionally hallooing or blowing horns and whistles to attract the attention of the lost girl should she be within sound of their voices and instruments. They moved steadily on until noon, when they met another party of men, who had been searching in another direction. A halt was called, and after consultation thought that it was no use to push the hunt further in this manner, as all were sure that they must have overtaken the girl ere this she was simply walking about."

Arthur lay on the grass with his hat over his eyes and a great cry going out of his heart.

"Oh, Grace! Grace!" he cried mentally. "If there is such a thing as thought communication to tell me where you are, that I may come to you."

He had begun to think that she must be dead, yet he could not rid himself of the impression that she was calling him. Could it be that she was calling him from the other world?

"If only I knew," he thought, "I could bear to be here."

Presently he remembered that she had often told him that in order to receive a message it was necessary that the mind should be a calm and passive state. With a strong effort of will he controlled his feelings, and remained perfectly quiet while he awaited the coming of the message. In the course of a few moments the well-known driver passed over his nerves, followed by a glimpse of an open space in the woods, a dark hole and something lying at the bottom.

"Like a flash it came to him that Grace might have fallen into some hole and been hurt beyond his helping."

"Have we passed any holes into which she could fall?" he asked of Bentley, starting up suddenly.

"I haven't noticed any," was the answer. "Yet we haven't looked particularly, as we were so sure she would be found wandering around."

"Let's go back and look over the ground you went over last night," said Arthur, springing to his feet, with fresh hope in his face.

The men were nothing loth to go in the direction of home, so they were soon in readiness to start. Arthur walked beside Bentley in silence for awhile, looking carefully for every appearance of a hole. At last he stopped still.

"I'm going to try an experiment Bentley," he said, taking some twine from his pocket and fastening it to a tree as he spoke. "I wish you wouldn't question me, but you and a few men wait here until I've had an hour ahead of you then follow me slowly."

"All right," said Bentley, so completely discouraged that he would have followed anything Arthur suggested, if only to be relieved from the oppressive responsibility of leading a hopeless hunt.

Arthur plunged into the forest letting the ball of twine in his hand unwind as he went.

When he had gone far enough away from the rest of the men, so they were soon in readiness to start. Arthur walked beside Bentley in silence for awhile, looking carefully for every appearance of a hole. At last he stopped still.

"I'm going to try an experiment Bentley," he said, taking some twine from his pocket and fastening it to a tree as he spoke. "I wish you wouldn't question me, but you and a few men wait here until I've had an hour ahead of you then follow me slowly."

"All right," said Bentley, so completely discouraged that he would have followed anything Arthur suggested, if only to be relieved from the oppressive responsibility of leading a hopeless hunt.

Arthur plunged into the forest letting the ball of twine in his hand unwind as he went.
