Speaking Slightingly of Women

When a young man habitually speaks slightingly of women, one may feel reasonably sure that a moral blight rests spon his own character.

A scratching rebuke was once conveyed to a man of this class, who, at a publie dinner at which no ladies were present, was called upon to respond to the toast, "woman."

He dwelt almost entirely upon the frailties of the sex, exclaiming that the best among them are little better than the worst; the chief difference being in their surroundings. At the close of the speech, one of the mests arose and said : "I trust the gentleman, in the applica-
