Addison's Military Record.

Dr. Mitcheli's interesting article in last weeks's HERALD on muster day and military organizations in Addison township is suggestive of a few facts that linger in the memory of some of us that his memory does not rearch, and which may be of interest to the general reader. While endorsing all the favorable things he says in regard to Gen. Ross' fine military comis suggestive of a few facts that linger in in regard to Gen. Ross' fine military company, organized, in 1845, the Doctor hardly does justice to some remarkably fine companies that reflected great credit on Addison township before that time. He says, "the military organizations of this county, or this part of it, were of rather a primitive character until 1845, when the Addison Infantry was organized," Just what he would have us to understand by characterizing them as primitive in character, is left to inference. If he means they were not drilled, uniformed and armed according to the most approved tactics known then to army regulations. he reckons without his host. The military spirit that prevailed in Addison township as early as 1828 led to the organization of three as fine military companies as have ever graced Pennsylvania, and neither money nor labor was spared in uniforming and equipping them in accordance with the military code them are some indebted to said estate to make having claims against add estate will present them duty authority. command of Capt. for the stalwart size of its rank and file."

The company was organized in 1828 with Thomas Endsley, as Captain; John Mitchell, (the Doctor's uncle) as first Licutenant; James Johnson, as 2d Licutenant and Andrew Cring, as orderly sergeant. The uniforms were made of dark blue cloth, adorned with white braid blue cloth, adorned with white braid well-state property.

The company was fortunate in having a martial band that attracted unusual attention in all batallion parades. As an infantry company their arms were of the approved United States muskets with bright steel bayonets.
