EXCITING RACE FOR LIFE.

The Engineer's Story of an Incident that Nearly Cost His Life and Thousands of Others.

From the Philadelphia Times. "Boys," said the old engineer reflectively, as he refilled his pipe and returned the tobacco pouch to the conductor, "it is just twenty-seven years ago to-night since I had an experience which mighty near drove me from the road. Mebbe if it had I'd been better off to-day, but that's neither here nor there. If you fellows care to listen I'll tell about it while we're waitin' here for No. 6 to pass."

"Let ber go, Bill," chorused the crew, for the engineer's stock of stories man on the division.

"Well," began the veteran, as he settled back comfortably, "that was long before we had many of the improvements now used. It was before the days of pipe lines, and every gallon of oil burned east of the mountains had to be shipped by rail. At first it was all in barrels, but it wasn't long till some one invented the tank-car for carryin' it in bulk, and then the fun began for the train hands. Perhaps you don't see anything particularly unusual in the idea of a tank ear, exceptin' its bad smell, but if you imagine one of them things loaded to the last gallon and in a blazin' wreck
