Might Destroy All Life. In a signed article in The Electrical Review Nicola Tesla describes some of his experiments in the line of electrical currents of high voltage and gives details of the coil which he used. "The discharges of such a coil," he adds, when of an electromotive force of a few millions of volts, excite powerful affinities in the atmespheric nitrogen, causing it to combine readily with the oxygen and other elements, particularly in the presence of aqueous vapor.

"So energetic are them actions and so strangely do such powerful discharges behave that I have often experienced a fear that the atmosphere might be ignited, a terrible possibility, which Sir William Crookes, with his pier, ing intellect, has already considered. Who knows but such a calamity is possible? And who can tell with certitude that periodical cosmitions of organic life on the globe might not be caused by igniion of the air and destruction of its life sustaining qualities, accidentally or as a consequence of some accumula tive change? A Jump of coal will he for centuries unaffected in contact with exygen, but, the combustion once started, the process continues as long as there are elements to combine."
