AFTERNOON IN MARCH.
BY H. W. LONGFELLOW.
The day is ending,
The night is descending;
The marsh is frozen,
The river dead.
Through clouds like ashes,
The red sun flashes
On village windows
The glimmer red.
The snow roommences,
The buried fences
Mark no longer
The road or the plain.
While through the meadows,
Like fearful shadows,
Slowly passes
A funeral train.
The bell is pealing,
And every feeling
Within me responds
To the dismal knell.
Shadows are trailing,
My heart is bewailing,
And tolling within;
Like a funeral bell.

No answer but the soft falling rain.
"That's mighty strange. Seems to me—why hello! what are you doing then?"
"Corporal Jones' tongue was suddenly paralyzed, as he stooped slowly and felt the body at his feet."
"Good God! Jim. He's dead. Some Johnny's killed him."
"Jim was down on his knee in an instant, with his hand over the dead man's heart, his gaze peering down in the darkness into the staring upcast eyes."
"He's warm yet. They've took his overcoat, cap and gun. Let's give the alarm, Jones. Or, no! you go back and I'll stay."
The excitement along the picket line became intense, as the news passed from lip to lip. A better soldier or braver man than John Ricketts never lived. How it happened that he was thus overcome, and suffered his life to be thus sacrificed, was a marvel to his comrades.
With the strong daylight came the conclusion that some prowling foe had come upon him while neglectful of duty, or perhaps when he was dozing. The dead man's defiant dying words were as though they had never been uttered. A doubt was cast upon the grave of one of the world's great heroes.

asked him for the pass word. He wouldn't give it, and I settled his hash then and there."
"How?" queried the listener. He was looking at the guard now with glaring, hungry eyes, but the guard did not observe him. He was twirling his musket again.
"I used my knife, the handiest thing. Dar'sn't shoot. Heard afterwards they had found him dead. His name was—"
"Ricketts!" said the listener, as he sprang to his feet; and grasping the musket from the guard, shot him through the heart as he exclaimed "he was my brother. I'll die satisfied now that I have avenged him."
"Ere the sound of the report died away, a second report attracted the attention of the captives under the tattered blankets. Looking around wildly, they beheld their comrade lying prostrate beside the guard he had killed.
"Poor Dan!"
"Reckon he must a been taken with a crazy fit."
"Fellas, we'd better look out, or we'll pay up for Dan's mistake."
And with these comments the names of the brothers were put aside, only to be brought back from the storehouse of memory when, in after years, the conversation drifted into reminiscences of the war.

A Rare Copartnership.
One of the best farms in Franklin county is owned and managed by two brothers, whose backs are now silvered by many years of honest labor. Their well-kept lands extend over hundreds of acres, including some of the most fertile pastures, where graze in the summer seventy-five or eighty head of young cattle—one of the best herds of Durhams to be found in New England. Hundreds of acres of woodland are covered with a heavy growth of timber, and instead of being pillaged and robbed by the invading axe, are increasing in value every year. Extensive orchards are in the best bearing condition, and frequently contribute over a thousand dollars to the annual income. They own a dairy of some twenty cows, and the golden butter produced is some of the best that finds its way to the Boston market. Each of these brothers has a family, and they reside in two grand old farm houses in close proximity, beneath the spreading branches of magnificent elms. But what seems a little remarkable in this age of greed and selfishness, is that the relations of the two families are always most friendly and in perfect harmony. They share everything in common. There is no division of the proceeds of their well-paying farm. Either draws for the wants of himself and family, as the occasion requires, without any particular consultation with or permission of the other. There is a confidence and a reliance upon the integrity of each other that is as rare as it is beautiful. If a member of one household is sick, he or she is cared for as tenderly by those from the neighboring house as by those beneath the same roof. There is no finding of fault because some may think they are doing more than their share of the common work. As the wife of one of the brothers is an invalid, the management of the dairy has fallen to the lot of the other; but this extra duty is charged as a matter of course, and is the source of no unpleasantness. Each of the brothers has a son, and it is probable that the grand old farm will be transmitted to them still undivided, and that the same peaceful family relationship will be continued for another generation. We doubt if a like instance of happy copartnership can be found in any country.—Greenfield (Mass.) Gazette.

Fun in Indianapolis.
A day or two since, says the Indianapolis Journal, a ruralist from Anderson or thereabouts visited the city on business, and in the course of his peregrinations purchased a package of Roman candles for the purpose of amusing his progeny on his return. His fireworks were carefully deposited in a rear pocket, on and a short time thereafter he wended his way to the evening train. While loitering in the waiting-room admiring the stacks of ginger-bread, hard-boiled eggs and doughnuts temptingly displayed on the lunch-counter, he carelessly whisked his left coat tail against the red hot stove, and trouble immediately ensued. The first rocket narrowly missed the face of a native who was in a comatose condition, caused by much extract of hop, and, without waiting to inquire into particulars, he made the door in two gigantic leaps. All the occupants of the room immediately endeavored to follow his example, and, with a worthy determination not to be distressed, the proprietor of the candles forced himself into the midst of the throng endeavoring frantically to escape. In the meantime the candles fizzed and popped, giving strength to the evident impression that the party was being bombarded with some sort of infernal machine; and, strange as it may seem, the innocent cause of all the trouble was the worst frightened man in the lot. Not until fearful holes had been burned in the broadest portion of his nether garments, and the epidermis looked as though a strong mustard plaster had been pulled off violently, did he discover the cause of the panic. Order was finally restored, though the effects on that man's coat tails were disastrous; and we are also informed that his unmentionables required immediate hallooing. The victim was willing to testify that not one of the candles missed fire.

Reminiscences of the Ranks.
BY WARBURTON.
The cold, drizzling rain. A figure standing behind a tree as motionless as the tree itself. A blot in the blackness, a wavering mass, a nameless form in the dim distance.
Away beyond the thicket that bound the stream, flickering so unsteadily that at times the figure beside the tree thought they were in motion, shone the camp-fires of the enemy.
Standing there in the solitary blackness, with the cold water drip, drip, dripping steadily from his cap upon the upturned collar of his overcoat, from the visor of the cap to the hollow of the hand that was clenched in front of the musket, which was shielded from the rain by the folds of his overcoat; from the hand to the ground, the figure beside the tree gradually drew up his shoulders, shivered for the twentieth time for the last hour, and thrust his right hand suddenly in his pocket, and as suddenly withdrew it with an imprecation, as he had done thrice within the hour.
"I'd sooner be dead than without tobacco! That's the second or third time I've fouled myself since I come on the post," said the picket aloud.
The snapping of a twig arrested his attention. Instantly the barrel of his musket fell into his left palm, as the right hand clasped the stock, the thumb on the hammer of the lock.
"Who goes there?"
No answer. The rain trickled along the bare branches of the trees overhead, and dropped irregularly with a faint splash on the bare ground; with a trickling sound upon the leaves. It trickled slowly down the picket's neck, crawled searchingly down his back, ran down the soaking pantaloons into the soaking socks, and heaped swell the spongy leather in the boots.
Still the picket stood there in the attitude of a man ready to attack; prompt to defend himself; stood there in the drizzling rain as silently as though he were chiseled from marble.
At the end of perhaps five minutes, maybe more, maybe less, a peculiar sound fell upon the strained ear.
"Curse the thing!" exclaimed the picket, as he once more folded his musket in his overcoat, and stood with his back against the tree. "If I had that fellow back in camp I'd attend to him. If any of them shouts come within reach of my bayonet, I'll bet my back pay agin a chaw of tobacco somebody'll get a mess of roast pig pretty soon. Pesky things!"
As he ended his soliloquy, a firm hand grasped him by the throat with a fierceness and suddenness that deprived him of all power. His tongue protruded, he felt his eye-balls starting from their sockets, and his strength forsook him utterly; and his musket slid from his nerveless hands, and in a moment more he was writhing upon the ground at the mercy of his foe.
Short, sharp, decisive. No noise; no outcry; no struggle.
"Now then," said the conqueror, as he pressed a knee on the half-strangled man beneath him, "the pass-word?"
A faint gurgle arose from the captive's lips. He was gasping for breath, and attempting to speak at the same time.
"Quick! the pass-word, or you are a dead man!"
The captive looked up at his captor defiantly, wickedly.
"Not by a—"
Was that an oath? Whatever it was, it was suddenly cut short by the hand above him. Meantime the captor felt for his knife. There was a flash in the dim light, and the life-blood of the half-strangled picket welled up and flowed out upon the wet ground.
Ten minutes later, when the relief came around, mutterings, growls and curses were plenty.
"Where in the name of thunder can he be? He ought to be here," said Corporal Jones. "Ricketts! I say Ricketts! Where in— are you?"

The Value of a Newspaper.
The following is the experience of a mechanic, concerning the benefits of a newspaper:
Ten years ago I lived in a town in Indiana. On returning home one night, for I am a carpenter by trade, I saw a little girl leave my door, and I asked my wife who she was. She said Mrs. Harris had sent her after her newspaper, which my wife had borrowed. As we sat down to tea, my wife said to me by givee name:
"I wish you would subscribe for the newspaper, it is so much comfort to me when you are away from home."
"I would like to do so, said I, but you know I owe a payment on the house and lot. It will be all I can do to meet it."
She replied:
"If you will take this paper, I will sew for the tailor to pay for it."
I subscribed for the paper; it came in due time to the shop. While resting one noon, and looking in it, I saw an advertisement of the county commissioners to let a bridge that was to be built.
I put in a bid for the bridge, and the job was awarded to me; on which I cleared three hundred dollars, which enabled me to pay for my house and lot easily, and for the newspaper. If I had not subscribed for the newspaper, I would not have known anything about the contract, and could not have met my payment on my house and lot. A mechanic never loses anything by taking a newspaper.

CLAY AND THE GOAT.—Formerly a very large, well-known, and somewhat noted billy-goat roamed at large in the streets of Washington, and the newspaper boys, boot-blacks, and street urchins generally made common cause against him. Henry Clay disliked to see dumb animals abused or worried, and on one occasion, while passing down the avenue, a large crowd of these mischievous urchins were at their usual sport, Mr. Clay with his walking-stick drove them away, giving them a good sound lecture in the meanwhile. As they scampered and scattered in every direction, Billy, seeing no one but Mr. Clay within reach, made a charge on him, Clay dropped his cane and caught his goatish by the horns. The goat would rear up, being nearly as high as the tall Kentuckian himself, and the latter would pull him down again. This sort of thing soon became tiresome, and he could conceive of no way by which he could free himself from the two-horned dilemma, so in his desperation he sagged out to the boys to know what to do. One of the smallest in the crowd shouted back: "Let go and run, you d—d fool!" Clay always maintained that though he signed the treaty of peace at Ghent, yet that ragged boy knew more than he did.

An Ingenious Instrument.
Droz, a mechanic of Geneva, produced a clock which excelled all others in ingenuity. On it were seated a negro, a shepherd and a dog. When the clock struck, the shepherd played six times on his flute, and the dog approached and flawned upon him. This wonderful machine was exhibited to the King of Spain, who was greatly delighted with it.
"The gentleness of my dog," said Droz, "is his least merit. If your Majesty will touch one of the apples which you see in the shepherd's basket, you will admire the animal's fidelity."
The King took an apple, and the dog flew at his hand barking so loud that the King's dog, which was in the room, began to bark loudly. At this the courtiers, not doubting that it was an affair of witchcraft hastily left the room, crossing themselves as they departed. Having desired the Minister of Marine (the only one who ventured to remain) to ask the negro what o'clock it was, the Minister did so, but obtained no reply. Droz then observed that the negro had not yet learned Spanish, upon which the question was repeated in French, when the black immediately answered him. At this prodigy the firmness of the Minister also forsook him, and he retreated precipitately, declaring that it must be the work of a supernatural being.

NOTICE.
I, J. B. BOLARD, of Tionesta, do hereby thank the Lord for the very price of peopling the earth. There was no benediction that morning worth speaking of.—Gross Valley Rep.
A Boston correspondent of the Rutland (Vt.) Herald thus explains the "dark ways" of the lobbyists in Boston: "A friend of mine, who has been a member of the Legislature for a number of years, was talking of the principal lobbyist at the State-house a short time since. My friend said to him, 'Well, Mr. —, you never got around me when you wanted to carry through any of your schemes.' 'Oh, yes,' replied the other; 'I always got some honest old farmer to take a seat next to yours, and tell you that his particular friends in the country wish ed it done; and it would be a great benefit to their towns, and you always voted just as I wanted you to.'"
S. J. Bestor, an eccentric gentleman of Hartford, regularly stamps all letters held for postage in that city, attaching to the envelope a printed statement of the fact. The responses he has received would fill a large volume. A resident of Elizabeth, N. J., writes that Marcus L. Ward, became Governor of that State through that course. A Boston burglar says: "Bestor, you're a gentleman; I am—no matter what; but I got a letter you stamped just in time to dodge the banks and be off. He's a stamp, and if I ever happen in Hartford in a professional way, I shan't crack your bio if I know my self."
An exchange, says the Louisville Ledger, describing a fashionable party, speaks of a gallant who who sprang the lady "and took her apart." It is not a very difficult feat to "take a lady apart" these times, but there is very little left of her afterward.
The "French Curve" has taken the place of the "Grecian Bend," and is not considered much of an improvement on the old style.
A Detroit bridegroom was so affected by the marriage ceremony that he burst into a violent fit of the nose-bleed.
When a man has "no mind of his own," his wife generally gives him a piece of hers.
When women are in arms they never oppose the liberty of the press.
