NELLIE WILDLOVE.

BY J. E. T.

The Stockton stage-coach, drawn by four-in-hand, was slowly wending its way through one of the canons of the Sierras in the Southern Mines one beautiful May afternoon, loaded down with a party of Eastern tourists.

"Hudson's Bar was before my time," said the driver, as he threw his long lash over the back of the near wheel-horse.

"Perhaps the gentlemen would not mind listening to that Wildlove yarn, Bill, and as we've got an hour or so before sundown it will help to pass the time."

"During the Spring of '53 there came to Hudson's Bar two persons, from no one knew where, who exerted a great influence upon the community almost as soon as they alighted in front of the hotel.

"The little spark of pique in the hearts of the two friends, caused by Nellie's changing preferences, was gradually fanned into something stronger, and from visiting her at different hours they at last dissolved partnership in the claim, Never's buying Clamor out.

"At 5:30 o'clock both parties, wishing to be in time, were upon the ground, and after conferring with their seconds, prepared for the fight without speaking a word to each other.

"The principals took their places opposite each other; the pistols were handed to the men who were about of the sensation of the day. They had seen Nellie Wildlove, and wondered. From wondering they had begun to talk with each other about her, for they proved no exception to the general rule, and admired the increasing little beauty.

"These two men became almost constant visitors at the hotel, coming when others were away and Nellie was alone. Clamor cultivated the conversation with his jovial wit, while Never's handled the weightier and more sober subjects that might arise.

"From that moment a deadly animosity sprang up between the two, each thinking that the other held the attributes of a changeable girl.

"A collision between these two men could not be avoided; and one night they met. The Arcade was crowded, George Wildlove's game being in full blast, while the balls were rolling for 'rondo' on another table.

"The narrator passed his hand across his brow as he concluded, and leaned back in his seat as if he had told all that was necessary; but the tourists commenced a series of questions in regard to the narration, which drew out the fact that Wildlove was hauged to attempt each other's lives, and as the sun disappeared behind Table Mountain the word was given to fire. Two shots rang out on the cool evening breeze, and reverberated among the pines on the hillside.

"Both of the seconds, who were the only persons present except the principals, had hurried to the side of Clamor, and did not see Never's fall.

"Clamor moved his lips, and bending nearer, the two men caught the words, 'Tell Will to come.' He then became insensible, but the seconds unhesitated that he wished to speak to Never's before he died, for they saw that the wound was mortal, and looked around for Will, whom they hallooed standing.

"Will, she said she'd be a sister to me, and kissed me, because I asked her, were the words that followed: 'Great God!' exclaimed Never's, summoning up strength with a super-human effort; 'I have shot you, Harry, and caused my own death, for a girl that could not love either of us, and is already married!'

"Never's was carried to the camp in an insensible condition, and being placed in a room at the hotel, was attended by two physicians promising in the camp. The news of a duel spread throughout the community, and created more chagrin among the rough inhabitants than sorrow or excitement, for many had resolved to be present the next morning, and designated the race of the duellists as 'a mean dirty trick, unworthy of gentlemen.'

"As she passed along the hall George Wildlove, who had at that moment ascended the stairs, stopping her, asking in a rough voice where she had begun, Nellie was met in the mood to submit to insolence at that moment, and replied that it was none of his business; whereupon Wildlove, who was intoxicated, made a motion as if to strike her, and would probably have done so had he not received a blow himself from behind, which sent him reeling against the wall.

"A wagon drawn by two mustangs, containing a man and woman, was seen by a crowd of miners and gamblers assembled in front of the Arcade Saloon, as it rattled out of the camp on the road to Chinese Camp, and they knew that Nellie Wildlove would never again return to Hudson's Bar.

"The narrator passed his hand across his brow as he concluded, and leaned back in his seat as if he had told all that was necessary; but the tourists commenced a series of questions in regard to the narration, which drew out the fact that Wildlove was hauged near Placerville about a year after the affair at Hudson's Bar, for some violation of the laws of Judge Lynch, and that Never's recovered entirely from his wound. 'What has become of him?' asked one of the passengers, as the stage stopped in front of the City Hotel in Sonora. 'What has become of him?' repeated the stranger, as he climbed down from the coach; 'Well, if you ask Sam, there (pointing to the driver), he might tell you that my name is Bill Never's,' and the stranger passed into the hotel.

Fun From Our Exchanges.

Hints on Etiquette.

The more distant your friends are, the more you should call—if you want to make yourself heard.

When you take a friend home to dine with you for the first time, count the plates before you let him go home. It saves subsequent awkwardness.

If a friend wants to borrow an umbrella, send for a policeman at once, and give him in charge. It will guard against a repetition of the error.

Should you happen in a discussion to find that you and your opponent are likely to take opposite views, knock him down at once, for fear you should be led into a quarrel.

His Earthquakes.

Many years ago there was in the lunatic asylum at Worcester a kind of crazy Davy Crockett, who fancied that he could do anything that could be done, and a little more. One day a good many visitors were walking slowly through the halls examining them, and occasionally saying a word or two to the patients.

"One of the visitors replied, 'No; we've had nothing of the kind where I live.'

"I thought so; I know it," returned the patient, frowning. I have an enemy, Ice! Ice! Why, I ordered one of my very best earthquakes for your part of the country. It was to have tipped up the earth, and sent the Mississippi into the Gulf of Mexico. Look here," he continued, pointing to a crack in the plastering, "that's one of my earthquakes. What do you think of that? I've got more orders for earthquakes than I can attend to in a year. I've got four coming off up North this afternoon—two in Vermont."

An old yet good story, which has not yet appeared in print, so far as we know, is told of a Buffalo hotel-keeper, who engaged a handsome, well-dressed bar-keeper, who parted his hair in the middle and wore a diamond ring. In two years thereafter the hotel-keeper became insolvent, his establishment was sold out by the sheriff, and the purchaser was none other than the bar-keeper. Out of compassion he engaged his old employer to compound the insidious cocktail and the soothing snuff. In two years more the whirligig of time had brought about his revenges, and the hotel was again sold out. This time the first proprietor bought it back. But he did not re-engage that bar-keeper.

The editor of a daily paper in Madison, Ind., has been screened at night by a party of young women. Madison is probably the only town in the United States where this species of filioy is not monopolized by young men.

George A. Sala has issued a new book entitled "Under the Sun." The public have learned all or that they wish to the past season; so if he wants to succeed let him advertise something from the other side.

The following notice of death in the columns of a contemporary is quite capable of two meanings: "Maria B., wife of Henry B., Esq., aged 80 years. She lived with her husband 50 years, and died in the confident hope of a better life."

It takes time to make aspirants for literary fame understand that the columns of a newspaper are not to be devoted exclusively to historical display. When contributors send in news condensed in the smallest possible space, without beautiful sentences, then editors rise up and say, "How you, my children, bless you!"

The fashion of utilizing one part of the human body to repair another is extending. A young man in Waverly, N. Y., had his foot mangled by a car, and a space of several inches on the upper part sloughed off. Several pieces of flesh were taken off the man's arm and planted on the wound, some two weeks ago, and have all "taken hold," and the foot is fast recovering.
