The Corry Blade has suspended. It was a dull blade at best, and gave Paine to its readers, not because of the keenness of its thrusts, but principally because it was not wielded scientifically.

G. W. Robinson is putting an extra story on the back part of his house, which part has heretofore consisted of one story only. This will give him more room, which is what he wants.

Andrew Jacksonian Cameron Porter, whose disappearance from the scenes of his usefulness in September last was duly noticed, and lamented to the tune of about $4000.00, took a course toward the setting sun, as will appear from the following extract from the Lone Tree (Nebraska) Sentinel, of September 24th:

Mr. A. C. Porter, of Philadelphia, and former Editor of the Clarion Jacksonian, called on the Sentinel office yesterday. Mr. Porter is looking for a site to locate a colony and wishes to purchase about 4,000 acres of land, in one body, for that purpose.

We discovered the above paragraph in the Sentinel while looking over some old papers on Saturday last. It's a great pity we hadn't read the paper more attentively when it came to us, as there were a number of persons directly interested in knowing his whereabouts; among others a young wife whom he married a few months before his abrupt departure.

The boys have anchored a number of set-lines, for suckers, in the river, and it is rather amusing to see the owners go out to lift the lines. Occasionally a fine sucker is bagged, but more frequently the sportive alligator gets fastened on the hook, and then the boys are exasperated.
