"UBERALL DU."

The girl was as gay as a lark ; the ball had been a delightful one; its to read it, and sealing it in another music still pulsed in her ear, until her envelope she returned it with the lockvery heart kept the beat. Young, et, "Thanking Mr. Hamlin for his kindbeautiful, beloved, and wealthy, this ness in permitting her to inspect it, and little Jennie of ours had the cream of this world at her feet, and as she took off her jewelry and flowers, and prepared herself for sleep, it was with a smile on her lips and a happy light in her dreamy eyes. One piece of jewelry she held in her clasped hands lingeringly, as if it were too dear to lay aside. It was a pretty trinket, a gold clasp or bar, and swing. ing from it by two tiny golden chains a polished Florida sea bean, dark as ebony, mounted like a locket. A legend was engraved on the bar in a for-ing tongue, "Uberall Du." Jennie's eyes scanned the words intently. "How stupid I am not to be able to translate this German," thought she. "It is something dear, I know, and just the thing, or Royall would not have had it. I wish I could sacrifice ing of it; but he thinks I can read it and I am ashamed to let him know I'm such a dunce after four years at boarding-school. Never mind, I shall discover the meaning sometime;" and with a blush and a smile, she kissed the triuket and put it tenderly in her casket. It was a triffing thing, but even that is precious from the man you love. Royall Hamlin had been at her feet all winter.

People said they were engaged, and considered the match certain, as people will when the principals in the game are not at all sure. It was so in this case. He had not proposed to Jennie, though he was all devotion, and, to tell the truth, Jennie felt a growing uneasiness lest she was becoming fond of him too soon; but she could not bear to distress herself with the thought. So, when this eve at the ball he had pinned the clasp upon her shoulder amid her snowy laces, and hoop. Jennie tried to read it ; Norah murmured in her ear in their quiet nook in the window that he would have something to say to her when he returned to town next week, Jennie's heart had given a quiet leap that had. dyed her sweet little face scarlet ; and he, noting it, had gone off with eyes tull of tr'umph. No wonder her locket seemed precious to her.

The next afternoon after the ball, as Jennie was walking with Ella Stuart, pronounced it very pretty, and herself his respectfully," etc.--very "high and mighty."

She was horribly wretched the next few weeks, and did not go in society. She had a morbid idea herstory might be out, and as it was, Lent came just in time to give her an excuse for being so quiet.

She pined so visibly that her friends thought her health flagging, and sent her to visit some relations in another State. She tried to be happy, but was not particularly successful; in fact, her efforts were a miserable failure ; it was hard to see what was preying upon her most, disappointed love, or a perfect agony of mortification at the thought of how transparent her heart had been to him and how he treated it like a toy. She was always seeking a my pride enough to ask him the mean- solution of his apparently gratuitous insult, and she could not find it! Had somebody been laughing about her patent devotion to him ? did he mean to taunt her with the utter hopelersness of her love ? She ground these bitter questions over in a hundred ways, and was like to break her heart.

Spring came and Jennie gradually regained a degree of her old serenity, but she did not wish to go home.

In the family of her friends was a charming girl of her own age, and they were fast friends, but Jennie never spoke of her mortification to her.

One day they were talking over the approaching marriage of Aunt Norah. 'Jennie," said she, "I never showed you the dear little ring Leonard gave me last fall, did I ?"

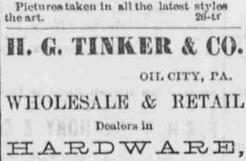

"No ; let me see it."

Norah brought it ; it was a beautiful turquoise iu a heavy gold hoop, and something was engraved inside the caught the glance. "'Uberall Du,' Jennie, isn't that sweet in Len to tell me so in such a darling way ?"

"What is it ?" asked Jennie in a quaking, uncertain voice, feeling somehow as if her life hung on a thread, that thread the significance of the words "Uberall Du," words which had proved so fatal to her happiness.

"Why, "Thee, over all.' Jennie, where have your eyes gone to? You studied German at Madam Armoud's with me; forgot so soon ?" "So that was it, 'Thee over all,' and what a fool she had been, eh?" were Jennie's last cheerful thoughts as she slipped quietly down by Norah's side in a dead faint. Miss Norah was horrified by Jennie's sudden attack, but when Jennie revived she assured her cousin she was in the habit of fainting at actually nothing, and the parlor must have been too warm. She deceived Noraha thoroughly, but not her own poor hearm on the avenue, she asked her, as if it were a sudden thought, if she "remembered her German ?"

"Not well, Jenny - pretty rusty ! What did you ask for ?"

"Because I have forgotten mine, and saw a fow German words in a lovelove story-" stammered Jennie, "and I couldn't make out the sense of them, and you know how aggravating that is!

"What were the words ?"

"As near as I can remember the vords," smoothly said our dimple-faced deceiver, "they were 'Uberall Du-''

"Uberall - Du-m-m," mur-mured Ella. "Why! I remember, it is a line out of German poetry, and means 'All is over with thee !'

She looked round at Jennie, tri umphantly, just in time to catch a perfect expression of dismay on a poor blanched face enough to make your heart ache.

"Why, Jennie! what is the matter ?" she exclaimed, catching her by the arm. Jennie just had strength left to totter into a shop near, and sink into a seat, whispering she "was faint," did not feel well all day, etc., making at the same time a sign for her companion not to attract attention, which cue Ella was quick to take, and carried out by an energetic chattering with madame with the friz, as to her quality of pink crush roses, which madame insisted were "French," as also her "whole stock of ribbons," etc., etc.

Jannie grew better as rapidly as she had fallen ill, and Ella thought it only over-fatigue after the ball. What would she have thought had she seen our poor Jennie an hour later, sobhing, face down on her dainty bed, safe locked in the sacred retreat of her cham-

> Foor Jennie. The day arrived upon which he had promised to be in town, and also to take her to drive. Jennie was in a ferment all day.

That afternoon, late, a well-known ring was heard at the door. Jennie's the name of God, what got you so fu-heart gave a perfect surge; but when the servant looked at hor enquiringly, she answered his glance with a cool "Eugaged, John," and hurried to her

Then she went up stairs and pondered upon "the situation."

The more she pondered the worse it seemed. She was too proud to own mistake and take back her hatoful words and manner, and seek him in any way, and pride "carried the day."

Her lather sent her into the mountains that summer, and, with a faw friends she wandered about; but the grace and charm of God's country, of rocky ledge, and balmy, whispering pine, and trickling mountain brook cold and clear, had no charm for her. One day they planned a fishing excursion to a large forest stream which crossed the stage road a mile or two beyond the hotel.

Jenuie crept away from the others with rod and line, and strayed along the brookside, through quivering lights and shades, among green leaves and shadowy places ; she went so far she was lost without perceiving it.

As she stood quietly on the bank watching a floating leaf, a voice behind her made her start with astonishment, so weli known was it--so dear.

"Can you tell me, miss, how far 1 am from the stage-road ?"

Jennie turned deliberately and looked in the face of Royall Hamlin. She actually relished his look of utter dismay and disconcertment.

"I-I beg your pardon, Miss Dane," said the amateur sportsman, stifly ; "I did not recognize you, or I would not have intruded upon you."

"You did not disturb me in the least, Royall," said Jennie, quietly, with scarlet face; "but I am sorry I can not tell you which way the road lies. I think I have come so far I must be lost myself."

He stood gazing at her, speechlees. At last he stammered ; "Miss Dane-Jennie-you called me 'Royall ;' you do not seem angry now. Tell me, in ed closer to her side by the brook Jennie hung her head.
