BETTER FROM GERMANY.

ED. REPUBLICAN:—It was the first day of April, a cold and windy, though to other respects beautiful day, on which I left Leipsic for a short sojourn into the country. As I bid good-bye to several friends who came with me to the station, I could not but think I was going again among strangers, where I must necessarily form new acquaintances, and accustom myself to new modes of living. I took my seat in the locomotive whistled, and I was off. In Leipsic I could be cheered by hearing a little English every day—at times entirely too much for rapid progress in German—but now I was going to a land where English as a communication of thought is a stranger, and English people seldom seen. I fully realized this, and tried to content myself in looking at the large and beautiful fields and towns which we were continually passing.

Bythra, the end of my journey by a pleasant little village, was reached after about sixty minutes' ride. From here I had a good hour's walk before me. So with a heavy package in one hand, a package in the other, and an umbrella under the same—traveler-style—I set out for Hohenlohe.

Everybody I met recognized in me a foreigner. The women would bid me the time of day; the men and boys would take off their caps and do the same. The German peasants in this respect are very courteous; you are expected to be every one, young and old, and you are expected to return the greeting. Not only is this the case when you meet on the road, but if a man away in the centre of a field sees you, and imagines you see him, he will lift his Eonian crown.

I reached Hohenlohe after a tiresome walk of nearly two hours, being weary on my weary way by the meriting of the birds, and the now smiling face of some rustic

German maiden. I did not consider my baggage heavy when I started, but I can assure you at the end of my journey it felt heavy enough for a common two-horse load.

The family with whom I was to live was expecting me, and soon had hot coffee and cake placed before me, to which I did ample justice.

In Leipsic one becomes accustomed to the rattling noise of the busy streets, to the merry voices of the people who continually throng the thoroughfares, to the strains of sweet music which flow out from nearly every house; in truth everything there is lively; you do not become lonely for want of something to see or something to hear; you can spend a pleasant and profitable evening at the theatre or some musical concert; you can take a walk into the Rosenthal, where you can see the elite of the city, attired in their best robes. But in Hohenlohe, how different! No wonder I was lonely the first few days. No wonder I at first thought myself foolish for leaving a lively city to go to the country and dwell alone, where I could not, perhaps, hear a word of English in a year, where amusements are as scarce as fire-engines and the streets are as void of people as they are of street lamps. But matters have changed: I am contented in my country home, because it was in such a place I was born and have lived almost my entire life. The country air possesses a purity that cannot be found in the city; the simplicity of the country people, the quietude and serenity with which one is here surrounded, the pleasant walk leading to neighboring towns, the beautiful groves in which sing the birds of spring, are in themselves sufficient to make German country life desirable. Those who have lived in the country know that there is a sweetness in that life that those who have been born and lived their entire life in cities never have experienced. Hohenlohe is a town of not over four hundred inhabitants, who are people of industry and enterprise, as their prosperity fully demonstrates. Farming is the chief source of revenue, and the manner in which their fields are kept is an honor to any people. The houses are principally old and of the old German style. The church, just a few rods from where I live, has been in service over four hundred years, and still receives the people twice every Sabbath within its shattered walls. The Pastor, with whom I live, is a German of the good, jovial class, who likes to converse and relate his little anecdotes, and, like all other Germans, finds great pleasure in the drinking of a glass of beer, or in smoking his long German pipe.

The country surrounding Hohenlohe is level and picturesque, and as you take a walk out into the open fields and look around you, you see no less than ten different cities and towns. Leipsic, about ten miles distant, can be seen with ease. A very short distance from here was fought one of the great battles of 1813.

I have noticed one peculiarity about the Germans which is to me both embarrassing and disgusting, and that is their inability, at times, to understand their own language when spoken to by a foreigner. It seems to me as though they expect a foreigner to get their language reversed, as it were, and when he gets it right they fail to comprehend this fact. For instance, when a young man steps up, full of confidence, and inquires for the University Church, and is shown into the University Kitchen, or after working an hour on an important question, and committing the same to memory, and then steps up to a gentleman and delivers it in regular native style, and receives the answer, "Ich verstehe das nicht," he cannot but feel somewhat disgusted as well as discouraged. This, I am thankful, does not happen so frequently now as earlier.

Perhaps your readers would like to know what we eat, and how we eat it, etc. The German mode of living is simple in its nature, requiring no great amount of cooking, and is, therefore, a pleasure to the girl, who is not obliged to stand all day long over a hot stove during a summer day. In the morning, bread, butter and coffee constitute your breakfast,—simply this and nothing more. This is usually brought to your room and you can have it at whatever hour suits you best. Dinner consists of soup, meat of some kind, potatoes and occasionally vegetables; you can have bread if such be the wish, but no butter is used at dinner. After dinner comes coffee; this is the time for making acquaintances at hotels. The coffee keeps the company together for a half or three-quarters of an hour, and as time is, apparently, not so precious with the Germans as with us, they find time for an hour's after-dinner talk. The stranger is kindly spoken to and drawn into the conversation, and after a few meals he feels perfectly at home. Supper is cold and consists of cold meat and pickles; for drink, tea is served. There may be a slight change in this at times, but it is seldom. I have become accustomed to this mode of living and am perfectly satisfied with it. Mr. Benj. W. May is enjoying good health, and has already favored me with two visits.

My dear friends, I like Germany; I like the German language; I like the German people, and, in fact, I am almost a German enthusiast.
