illustrated the practical nature of her religion. She was a true friend of the Union. Not only at home but on the field, in person, she ministered to the wants of our patriot soldiery. She presented the famous "Bucktails" with their regimental colors, the bearer of which was shot in the fight of Fredericksburg, his life blood consecrating the sacred emblem as he fell. In company with her kusband she went to Washington and urged upon Mr. Lincoln the importance of an exchange of prisoners with the Confederates. For nearly sixteen years prior to her death she never walked through the streets of her own town ; yet no other person in it, perhaps, was more thoroughly active in relieving private want, or whose influence was more widely felt in affairs of public charity. God has taken the beloved sufferer into His Infinite bosom at last ; but her virtues still remain in sweet and gentle memories.
