But an entirely new form has been developed by the progress of uncivilization in our midst. It has received the technic title of "Saloonacy." The physical symptoms are a very foul tongue, bad breath, a plethoric condition of the self-important gland, a brassy appearance of the face, and a serious depletion of the pocketbook. But the mental symptoms are more marked and singular. The mind seems to work by contradicting processes. The victim is often possessed with the impression that Prohibition doesn't prohibit, and therefore should be prohibited, lest it ruin the saloon business.

> Sometimes the poor saloonatic will argue with utmost sincerity that the best way to prevent drunkenness is to license men to open saloons where anybody that wants to drink intoxicants can obtain them, and where those who don't want them may be hired to learn; or he will tell you with the air of a philosopher that the abolition of the saloon, with all its train of crimes, pauperism and disease, will increase taxation, and that the mother of all immoralities is not a moral isssue, that the fountain of all villainy is the fortress of virtue. Or he will undertake to show you from figures which do not lie, that the prohibition of a business which, according to Mr. Gladstone, kills more than war, pestilence, and famine combined, will largely decrease the population.
