—The Christian Endeavor Convention in Boston.

—The fourteenth International Convention held in Boston was one of the grandest meetings our country has ever had. From one small society organized in Williston Chapel, some fourteen years ago, to thousands of societies to-day, Father Endeavor Clark certainly could not but feel proud of the vast army of young people assembled in the Convention, which has been the outgrowth of his effort. The one society has grown to thousands and spread through every state in the Union, and but six countries in the world where the magic words "Christian Endeavor" are unknown. The city of Boston cannot be excelled for hospitality; the Endeavor seemed to take possession of the city. An army of C. E.'s, with white caps and crimson bands, was scattered throughout the city waiting to be questioned by the stranger and anxious to give all information. Some one remarked, "Railroad officials and hotel clerks might learn a lesson in courtesy from these ever-obliging young people." All the famous historical places, of which Boston is so full, were thrown open. Three grand simultaneous meetings were held in Mechanics' Hall and two large tents on Boston Common. Some of the ablest speakers of the day were present, among them Father Clark, D. L. Moody and Gov. Greenhalgh, of Mass., besides hundreds of others. Any one with any Christian spirit whatever could not witness the earnestness and zeal which characterized these seventy-five thousand C. E.'s without catching the spirit of the meeting. One of the noticeable things in connection with C. E.'s is their Christian Fellowship. Denominational creeds are unknown in Endeavor work. They are all one body working for the Master. One speaker said, "If ever the world was christianized it would be through Endeavor work," and we might add, if ever the prejudice against other churches is overcome, it will be through the same influence. Hundreds of evangelistic meetings were held by ministers and others attending the convention, in factories, workshops, and on the streets; creeds were lost sight of; the cry was, "work for the Master."

—One of the topics discussed was "good citizenship." Being a C. E. implies being a good citizen. A native of India said, "India never would be brought to civilization unless the level of Christianity was laid upon it." The missionary was a strong feature. No one could help being a missionary to hear the converted heathen tell of the darkness and ignorance of their countries, and the prayers for help, and especially to the young, as being the ones who have the power to help. While heathen lands need our help, there is much missionary work to be done among our own people, by going in person to those who are heedless and unconcerned, trying to persuade them to enlist for Christ. A captain of the life saving service was introduced at one meeting and told how those noble young people made their hardships lighter by visits and literature. He showed how we might "throw out our life line," and be in the life saving service.

—The sociability of C. E.'s was ably discussed. We cannot do good work unless social distinction is unknown. We must be one. We cannot accomplish anything by getting others into our societies and then in every-day life leave them to their own devices. A grand feature was the singing. Songs of praise were heard from every quarter of the city; on the street cars, in the stores, public gardens, wherever a crowd gathered could be heard their voices. At each meeting thousands were unable to gain entrance to either the hall or tents, when open air meetings would be held. The C. E. society was called a meeting against the wrong, which never adjourns. Ministers say the society has been more help in their work than anything ever done in our churches, training the young to work; arousing the older ones.

—Many of the delegates lingered after the convention closed to visit the notable places of Revolutionary fame. On Bunker Hill's once bloody ground the people were addressed by an American and a Briton standing between flags of both countries. After the addresses the flags were planted together, showing harmony and love between the countries. Plymouth Rock was visited by thousands, and the bicyclists wheeled over Paul Revere's route to Lexington.

—Altogether the convention was a grand inspiration to all workers, and patriotism was wonderfully aroused by visiting the scenes of so much strife.

—Many are already looking forward to Washington in '96, which promises to be even greater, in numbers, than the meeting of '95. But Washington or any other city cannot excel the hospitality and welcome extended by Boston. May the good work increase until every country on the globe shall know the effects of it, and be brought to the Master.
