Turbulant Mountain Stream Figures in First Campaign of Washington.

EXPLORATION OF THE STREAM.

culties-Progress Stopped at Ohio Pyle and Party Abandons the Attempt as Useless.

The Youghlogheny river is a turbulent mountain stream which comes up into Pennsylvania from the high lands a vexed existence finds oblivion in the muddy flood of the Monongahela a: McKeesport. In the old keelboat days it was slackwatered a short distance from its mouth, but the grass-covered remind the observer of those other days. The railroad robbed it of its hope of usefulness. To-day it flows unhindered down the cascady course, and does for man no more than possibly turn a few rural mill wheels.

This unpretentious stream figures in an interesting episode connected with the first military campaign of George Washington. In 1754 Lieutenant Colonel Washington was pushing his way toward the Allegheny mountains with his little army of three hundred men to support the effort of Captain Trent and Ensign Ward to build a fort for the Ohio company at the forks of the Ohio. Early in the march came the news that the French had captured the place and were proceeding to crect a fort of their own. Washington pushed on and entered the mountains, purposing to march to the mouth of "Red Stone river," on the Monongahela, where Brownsville now stands, and there to fortify a base for future action against the French on the Ohio. On May 18 he reached the Great Crossings of the Youghlogheay, in the vicinity of what is now Somerfield. Here high waters detained him, so he assumed a posture of defense "and went down to observe the river." Having the idea of advancing by water from this point he determined to take the risk of making a personal exploration of this unknown stream. Accordingly, on May 20, in company with Lieutenant West, three soldiers and one Indian, he embarked in a canoe and began the dangerous descent through the mountain gorges. After proceeding half a mile the roughness of the stream compelled the party to go ashore. Here Washington met a ploneer trader. Peter Suver by name, of whom he records that he "seemed to discourage me from seeking a passage by water.' On resuming the journey some of the party waded most of the distance, for the canoe was none too safe. Finding that six men were too many for one canoe, a halt was made until "some sort of a bark" was constructed, with which they resumed the exploration. At the Turkey Foot, where three streams unite, near the site of the town of Confluence, a halt was made of considerable length. Washington was much impressed by the suitableness of this place as the site for a RUGGED YOUGHIOGHENY the commercial emporium of the com tral Ohio valley. In 1788 three parties of pioncers came down the Ohio to make settlements on the lands purchased by Judge Symmes between the Miamis. One of these parties located at Columbia, a second at North Bend, and a third opposite the mouth of the Licking. These latter named their settlement Losantiville, but soon after this whimsical name was set aside for the better one of Cincinnati.

Between these three new centers great rivalry existed. Judge Symmes lived at North Bend, and through his influence a garrison was stationed there. This gave the Bend a great advantage over its rivals, so that it began to outstrip them at a good speed. Settlers flocked to it because of the greater safety it afforded, and it seemed destined to become the great city of the Ohio valley. Suddenly all this was changed. The commander of the garrison moved his troops to tha straggling hamlet of Cincinnati, and from that day the fortunes of the latter place grew, and North Bend was almost wholly abandoned. The reason for this change, with its far-reaching results, is the story of the black-eyed beauty mentione4 above. At North Bend lived a settler whose wife was one of the most beautiful women on the frontier. So fascinating was she that the commander of the garrison fell desperately in love with her, and she responded in kin l. a uniform then as now proving doubly deadly to a woman's heart. This intrigue ere long became apparent to the husband of the fascinating fair one, and he, concluding to use discretion, took his dangerous wife and migrated to Cincinnati, Immediately the infatuated officer began to feel that Cincinnati was much the better place for maintaining a garrison. He went up, looked over the ground, and then came back and transported his post, garrison and all, to that place, At once the effects were seen. New settlers almost inevitably located near the garrison. Old settlers deserted their clearings and the other towns and clustered at Cincinnati. The place began to thrive, and has since maintained its marvelous growth down to this day. Columbia and North Bend have had far different fortunes. The one is forgotten and the other never grew to be the city that its founders hoped it would. Few incidents show better than this on what strange contingencies depend great results. This unnamed blackeyed beauty of so long ago well deserves the honor of being made the patron goddess of the Queen City of the West. It was those wondrous C. L. SMITH. Cincinnati.

DESTRUCTION OF COSHOCTON.

Capital of Delaware Indians Attacked by Troops and Braves All Killed. In a far-off time which seems as long ago as the days of Moses there was war between West Virginia and Ohio. Armies set out across the broad current of the Ohio river and carried desolation into the heart of the Ohio country. It was in 1781 that Coshocton was destroyed, and this is the story of how it came about. Coshocton was in the old days a Delaware Indian capital town. Here Captain Pipe, Bright Eyes, Killbuck, Big

Cat, Nanoland and other chiefs held sway. During the border wars connected with the Revolution the Delawares divided in their allegiance, one faction giving aid to the British at Detroit, and the other adhering to the Americans at Fort Pitt. At length, about 1781, the British partisans obtained the upper hand, and Coshocton

"P-r-o-v-I-d-e-n-c-e!" When the train stopped, a girl came up the steps, a tall, bright faced young woman, with an alert air that stamped he hadn't much time, for his Nemesis was coming toward them with a bright her instantly as one of the world's smile on his face-"could you forgive workers.

A man at one of the smoker windows me for deliberately deceiving you?" threw out a freshly lighted cigar and made his way into the back coach. "I by his happy face that you have forwonder," he mused, "why it is she algiven the boy." And Hilton's hand ways knows just what to wear and was inid caressingly on Jack's shoulder for a moment. "I want to thank how to wear lt-black skirt, not too you for it, for the fear that you would long, blue shirt waist, sailor hat?" "Allow me." Before she was aware of his presence he had raised the window she was tugging at. "You?" she interrogated.

"None other." he laughed. "And what do you mean by stepping into my car so unceremoniously? I thought you were in Boston, working as none but you can work." "Mother and I have been taking a much needed vacation two miles out of Providence with Aunt Ruth Armsly, mother's sister. You don't know what a time we have had-fried chicken, tresh milk and eggs, the tinest scenery and the dearest aunt in the world."

"Oh, but I do know," he interrupted, for I have been enjoying the same, minus the aunt, a few miles down the hay! I didn't feet like going the regular rounds this summer, so I took my vacation late and in my own way."

"Your vacation!" And Bessie Stuart laughed soft and low. "From what, please? Confess you have never done a day's work in your life."

"And you," he answered softly, "have done too many of them."

"No," she said quickly. She was afraid when this man's voice and eyes took on their present tone-of herself, perhaps, more than anything else. "Since I have taken up illustrating I have to use the minutes as well as the hours, so as to keep up my reporting." "Are you going to do reporting this winter? It is such hard, grinding work for a woman, Bessie, I hate to see you do it, and with all my heart I wish I had the power to say you shall not." She looked at him steadily. "Do you know that sometimes you are almost impudent? Yes, I must do reporting this winter. It will be a year at least before L can give it up for more congenial employment. Illustrating does not pay quite well enough yet to take eyes of hers which drew fortune to care of the Stuarts financially. I suppose your work will be the same," and her lips curled a little scornfully, "cigars, club dinners, the theater and the usual round of social functions?"

He glanced through the window at the falling leaves, a strange look on his handsome face. "Yes, Bessie; my work will be the same, will always be the same until life is put away."

"Oh, Jack," she exclaimed, "you were made for something better than an idle, useless life!"

He laughed and the spell was broken. But Jack Hammond knew by the way his heart thumped that it was danger-
