

The Smart and Silberberg Co.

The New Dress Goods.

Three weeks and Easter will be here. Considering all that must be done, time is short, but we're ready—ready in every sense of the word. Ready with a complete stock of the best and most desirable materials for spring and summer wear.

There's no scarcity of materials here. Our orders were placed months ago when the style tendencies first began to assert themselves. As a result we have the goods—prunellas, serges, satin stripe henreitas, English worsteds, satin directoire, and many other fabrics that are in great demand.

Every one of the beautiful new shades is represented, but with all the vast assortment there is need of promptness in purchasing. None of the pieces can be duplicated, and you may miss just the piece you wanted so much.

The Correct Styles are Here.

It is easy enough to be out of fashion. But to be right in style, in the latest style, in the best style—that is a different matter. We have the Right Attire for All Occasions.

No matter where you're planning to go or what you're planning to do, you'll find here the right Millinery, Suits, Gowns, Wraps, Lingerie, Gloves, &c., that will make you feel comfortable in mind as well as body. We appreciate the fact that much of our progress depends upon our study of the fashions and our extreme care in the selection of stocks; consequently you can buy at this store with the absolute assurance that the styles are correct and the merchandise reliable and dependable.

New Himalaya Cloths.

We have just received another consignment of the popular new fabric—Himalaya Cloth. At present, we have it in all the wanted shades, but on account of its extreme popularity it will be well to make your selection as early as you can.

Mrs. Dugald's Guest

(Original.)

"Really, mamma," Lois Hunter's sweet voice pleaded gently, "I don't care to go. I am tired of receptions, house parties and, in fact, of society in general. I just want to stay home quietly now with you and papa. While we were in Europe I grew so weary of rushing from one reception to another and being introduced as the daughter of Robert Hunter, the wealthy New York banker. I often wish papa didn't have so much money, then I would know for a certainty that I was liked for myself and not because of papa's money."

"But, Lois dear," her mother intervened, "you know Mrs. Dugald is such a dear friend of mine that she would feel slighted if you refused to go to her house party, especially as she is so fond of you. It will only be for a week and after that you may refuse as many invitations as you wish. But I can't understand it, dear. Before we went abroad you never seemed to tire of pleasure, and now you act weary and listless the greater part of the time. I will leave you now to think it over." So speaking, Mrs. Hunter went out of the room, leaving Lois alone. Darkness was deepening, but Lois did not want a light and drawing a chair in front of the fireplace in the cozy library, she fell into a reverie.

"Mamma was right," she mused. "I have not been myself of late, not since I met Harold Kenniston in Switzerland." At the thought, the color deepened on her pretty face and unconsciously she sighed heavily. Then she let her mind wander back to the summer before—her meeting with Harold Kenniston in the quaint little inn of the picturesque Swiss town—for three weeks they had been thrown together constantly—there had been drives and they had sailed on the pretty Swiss lake. Then the telegram which called him home—the hasty farewell with her father, mother and other guests gathered on the veranda to see him off, for he had become a general favorite. In saying "Good-by" he had pressed her hand and murmured in a low tone: "Your father says you are to remain another week—I will be back here within that time and then I shall say to you, Lois, what I have longed to say." That was all, and he was gone—the week passed slowly—he did not come—then came their departure for America and their arrival at their Brooklyn home. Now two months had passed and although she waited eagerly, she had heard nothing.

In this manner her thoughts trailed on until finally, with an impatient sigh, arising from her chair, she said with a determined air, "Well, I will go to Mrs. Dugald's—mamma says her cousin, a young nobleman, is visiting her and I shall go and enjoy myself. What right have I to be thinking of Harold Kenniston—he is nothing to me and never shall be—so it seems."

Accordingly, the next day, after an hour's ride on the train, Lois reached her destination, where she found Mrs. Dugald's carriage awaited her and she was driven rapidly to the pretty home of her hostess. As Mrs. Dugald clasped the girl in her arms and kissed her, in welcome, she exclaimed: "My, how sad you look, Lois dear!"

Lois was the first of the guests to arrive with the exception of Mrs. Dugald's cousin, the young nobleman, who had arrived the day before from England. Mrs. Dugald directed Lois to her room in order that she might refresh herself after her journey.

An hour later, Lois appearing, made a pretty picture attired in a dainty white gown, with her golden hair framing the fair face, yet there was a wistful look in her eyes.

Drawing the girl's arm through her own Mrs. Dugald led the way into the living room, where Mr. Dugald sat with another gentleman whose back was turned. It was just dusk and Lois could not see clearly. Mr. Dugald greeted her warmly, and then Mrs. Dugald, stepping forward, said: "Lois, allow me to introduce my cousin, Lord Kenniston. Harry, this is Miss Hunter."

Before Mrs. Dugald had finished speaking Lord Kenniston sprang forward and extended his two hands saying: "Lois—Miss Hunter," while Lois dazedly gave him her hand, at first growing pale, but when he spoke waves of crimson mounted to neck, face and brow. Mr. and Mrs. Dugald looked on in amazement and then tactfully withdrew. As the door closed on them, one look and Lord Kenniston drew the blushing girl into his arms and then told her the old story, which is ever new to the happy listener.

Then he explained how, after adjusting the matters which had called him home from Switzerland—his father had died suddenly, leaving him the title and estates; this caused the delay—he had arrived at the Swiss village a week later than he had promised, had vainly endeavored to find some trace of Lois or her parents, then came Mrs. Dugald's invitation to visit her in America and he had accepted it in the hope of finding Lois.

When Mrs. Dugald returned to summon them to dinner one look at the happy blushing face of Lois told her all. For the remainder of the week Lord Kenniston and Lois were the central attraction of the party. On her return home Lois wore a solitaire diamond and the following June became Lady Kenniston.

REMARKABLE.

About six weeks ago a swelling came in my groin 2½ inches from my navel about the size of a half lemon very painful and said to be caused by blood poison. I doctored about six weeks, and was getting worse, when Mr. Brown told me about San-Cura Ointment. I applied it as a poultice, changing morning and night, removing all pain at once. In two days it broke, discharging pus. I then changed it once a day until it was perfectly healed. I recommend San-Cura Ointment as the best poultice I ever used. It removes pain and all pus, keeping a sore moist and soft.
