A week ago Saturday night Captain Goodwin of the fishing schooner Good Luck reported the supposed disaster when he arrived here. The barkentine, which was either bound for or about 140 miles northeast of Cape Cod, during a heavy northwesterly gale while the Good Luck was standing by at the request of the barkentine to rescue the seamen on the sinking craft.

As the barkentine staggered along, her lee rail was awash, the deck slanting like the roof of a house and seething with water, Captain Goodwin saw that she was in a sinking condition.

Famous Singer Declares She Will Albany, Oct. 10 .- In spite of the fact that last year the chief game protector gave out a long list of casualties resulting from shooting accidents on the part of hunters in the Adirondacks and in the face of an equally long list of injuries sustained from the same source, Governor Dix is soon going hunting and, what is more, he is going Away-On Account of the Heavy to wear his famous old red sweater, a flagrant target to the eager hunter. When the governor expressed his intention of enjoying a month's vacation at McKeever, his Adirondack estate, and declared that he might do some hunting and in any event he would rough it, he was advised by one of his friends, who heard his declaration not to wear a brown suit or any conspicuous garment which might be mistaken for a deer.

"I always wear a red sweater," said the governor, "about the color of that carpet," he indicated with his foot as he spoke the soft maroon covering hailed from Bridegion, N. S., was lost stretched over the floor of the executive chamber.

The little group of the governor's well-wishers, mildly admonished the executive. They pointed out that a red sweater made a good target for a bad marksman and that many a man had come to an untimely end at the hands of an overzealous hunter as a result of wearing so conspicuous a bit of wearing apparel.

Governor Dix then explained that it was very seldom any one hunted in the vicinity of McKeever. He said that there were two watchmen in his employ to whom was entrusted the sole duty of prohibiting the presence of any ambitious huntsmen.

Boston, Oct. 10.-The Rev. Herbert S. Johnson, pastor of the Warren Avenue Baptist church, declares that the cost of saving souls in his church during the last year was $70 each.

"There is only one way by which one can obtain the approximate cost of saving a soul," said Mr. Johnson, 'and that is by taking the cost to run the church and dividing it by the number of apparent conversions made in a year. It costs us $14,000, and we had two hundred apparent conversions, making a cost of $70 a soul."
