The Lesson of the Storms

Our people mourn with those of sister cities; our Commonwealth grieves with its companion commonwealths, at the death which has fallen upon the people rom the storm and flood and fire which afflicted them. It was disaster wholly inexpected; it was a danger which the ufferers had hardly considered a danger The storm might come, but who would have thought it would overwhelm cities and make great areas desolate? How litle we know of what is safe and what is not and how foolish is man when he reates any condition which requires only the unusual to make it deadly. But for he works of man the storm would have ione but a tithe of the damage it caused. The masses of people behind a levee show how prone to take chances we are The reservoirs built above great populations showed in their unloosed might how folly has allowed the love of gain to dutl the minds which should have been alert to the danger stored with the waters. Dams and levees in early times were comparatively safe, since few people would be reached by running waters when they failed; but as the population great dams above Franklin and above the people of Sharon and the Beaver valley have recently proved. Out of the deaths which covered them, the victims in Ohio and Indiana warn the world anew to be content with the gifts of napuny walls against the floods. Well will it be for us if the injunction is heeded.

For the mourners in the stricken towns the whole world has sympathy, help in material ways, comfortings. Governors south and west and here in the center of the country bave need of what can be done. We are one people we of the According to a statement made by many states, and we share with one an-
