[illegible] tells us that the glutton shall come to poverty, we are not to be among riotous eaters of flesh; and even bids us to put a knife to our throats if we be men given to appetite. Is there no less desperate remedy?

Lord Bacon once told a companion that if some demi-god would dictate to us how much we ought to eat, it would put an end to half the miseries of the race.

Miss Edwards, we see noting in his diary: "I find that I cannot be convinced in the time of eating, that to eat more would be to exceed the bounds of temperance, though I have had two years experience of the like, and yet three minutes after I have done, I am convinced of it. But yet again I overeat, thinking I shall be somewhat faint if I leave off then; but when I have finished, I am convinced of excess, and so it is from time to time. I have observed the more it seems to be the truth, when it is according to my inclination, than when otherwise."

Jefferson says that "no man ever repents eating too little."

Sir Isaac Newton often dined on a penny's worth of bread.

Abernethy cured his indigestion and regained his flesh by "going into the country, where he could get good milk and eggs, and living upon three ounces of baked custard taken three times a day, with no drink but ginger-water. On this quantity of food he regained his flesh and uniformly got better."

Marion and his men waxed strong and valiant with no food but sweet potatoes, no drink but water, and no shelter but the sky.

"Besides brown bread, the Greek boatmen subsist almost solely on their native fruits, figs, grapes, and raisins. They are the most nimble, active, graceful, cheerful, and even merry people in the world."

Grant Thorburn attributes his cheerful old age to the fact that he "never eats enough," and thousands of his countrymen are wearing out their bodies not so much by the excess of business or multiplicity of cares, as by the overwork they crowd upon themselves in digesting surplus and unnecessary food.

THE LAW OF UMBRELLAS.

A correspondent of the Knickerbocker says he wishes to lay down the moral law on the subject of umbrellas, which people should observe.—Some who make great pretentions have a slender appreciation of the meum and tuum in particular cases. The very judge who condemns a criminal to the penitentiary, if the law were rigidly executed which he expounds, is often himself a thief!—Will he tell us in what code it is laid down that umbrellas are a thing in common? that they may be seized upon and appropriated, wherever found, without consideration? This, then, O, honest man! is the Law of Umbrellas:

"Section 1. If you are away from home, and caught suddenly in a shower, and you see an umbrella standing in some corner, for which there appears to be no owner, and being much in need of it to save you from a wet jacket you take it without ceremony—that is stealing.

"Section 2. If you have a cotton umbrella, and in your haste to get away, or because the lights in the hall are dim, exchange it for a neat silk one—that is stealing.

"Section 3. If, in stress of weather, you borrow one from an obliging friend, who insists on your taking it, and does not impress it on your recollection to restore it to him the next day—that is stealing.

"Section 4. If you find a stray umbrella in your house, which has been accidentally left and you give it house-room, without making any effort to find the bereaved owner—that is stealing.

☞ A little boy, two years of age, named George Hammond, living at Salem, Mass., attempted to drink some water from a tea kettle, a few days ago. The water was boiling, and the poor little fellow was badly scalded and died in great agony.

☞ Grief knits two hearts in closer bonds than joy ever can, and common sufferings are far stronger than common joys.

☞ Do all the good you can; you will find your own good in doing so.

☞ Keep good company, and be one of the number.
