Belle Boyd Again---Female Spies. A letter from Front Royal, dated the 12th, says: This town is a village of perhaps five hundred people. The houses are neat and cleanly, looking handsome where the ravages of war or the neglect of absolute idleness have not rendered them almost untenantable. There is one large, fine looking frame hotel yet open .--In the rear of the front building there is a large grass plot, with flowers and brick walls extending through it to the private residence of the owner or occupant of the hotel. The whole of this interior court is surrounded by a pleasant wooden balcony. Upon this at any time during the day you may pace to your heart's content, independent ef storm and sunshine. In the evening it is wondrously cool, and the air soothingly refreshing. It is here that some of the most accomplished wo-men in the valley assemble, with pur-pose and design to pump from our young lieutenants, who know but lit-tle of the stern realities of war, the ingly refreshing. It is here that tle of the stern realities of war, the name and number of their regiments -how many effective men their regiment can muster, and what their state of efficiency is.

These women are the most accomplished in Southern circles. They are introduced under assumed names to our officers, so as to avoid detection or recognition from those to whom their names are known, but their persons unknown. By such means they are enabled frequently to meet combinedly, but at separate times, the officers of every regiment in a whole column, and by simple compilation of notes, they acquire a full knowledge of the strength of our entire force. Has modern warfare a parallel to the use of such accomplishments for such a pupose! The chief of these spies is the celebrated Belle Boyd.

Her acknowledged superiority for machination and intrigue has given her the leadership and the control of the female spies in the valley of Virginia. She is a resident of Martinsburg when at home, and has a pious good old mother, who regrets as much as any one can, the violent and eccentric course of her daughter since this rebellion has broken out. Belle has passed the first freshness of youth. She is a sharp-featured, black-eyed woman of twenty-five, for care and intrigue have given her that appearance. Last summer, whilst Patterson's army lay at Martinsburg, she wore a revolver in her belt, and was courted and flattered by every lientenant and captain in the service who saw her. There was a kind of Di Vernon dash about her, a smart carriages, &c. pertness, a quick relort, and utter abandon of manner and bearing, which were attractive from their very romantic unwontedness. The father of this resolute black-eyed vixen is a paymaster in the Southern army, and formerly held a place at Washington under our government. She has undergone all that society, position and education can confer upon a mind suited to the days of Charles the Second, or Louis the Fourteenth-a mind such as Mazarin or Richlieu would have delighted to employ from its kindred affinities. Well, this woman I saw practising her arts upon our young lieutenants and inexperienced captains, and in each case I uniformly felt it my duty to call them aside, and warn them of whom she was. To one she had been introduced as Miss Anderson, to another as Miss Faulkner, and so to the end of the chapter. She is so well known now that she can only practice her blandishments upon the new raw lovies and their officers .--But from them she obtains the number of their regiments and their force. She has, however, a trained band of coadjutors who report to her daily-girls aged from sixteen upward-women who have the common sense not to make themselves as conspicous as she, and who remain unknown, save to her, and are therefore effective. The reports that she is personally impure, are as unjust as they are undeserved. She has a blind devotion to an idea, and passes the boundary of her sex's modesty to promote its success. She, with all her faults and false devotion to ideas, which are at the foundation of our political and social disorders, has not yet lost the crowning virtue of woman. Reportrs who thus attack a woman, defeaceless within their province, exceed the license which justice and fairness even allot to outlaws.

During the past campaigns in the Vailey, this woman has been of immense service to the enemy. She will now, if she can. She, therefore, should be at once passed beyond our lines, sent to Richmond, and allowed to remain with those with whom she deeply sympathises.

On all hands women either play the spy upon the conduct of this a: my, or openly express sympathy with the rebels. Our soldiers are detailed as guards constantly to watch over their personal safety, and over that of their property. The soldiers are uniformly insulted, and they bear it patiently. They propose that all disloyal women-those who are known to be acting as spies, or who openly boast of their treason-shall be honorably escorted beyond our lines, on the road to Richmond, with distinct and positive notice that they should not return, but should remain with their relatives at Rich. mond.
