The fires which have been raging in the lumber forests of Michigan. Wis consin and Minnesota are desolating an immense tract of country, estimated of at three thousand square miles. Small towns have been burned, hundreds of farmers have been made homeless by the besom of destruction, while forest animals are flying from the woods.

A later despatch says: The scanty despatches which come from the Northwest indicate that scarcely a tithe of the horrors of the burning forests has yet been told. All Northern Wisconsin and Michigan are ablaze, the loss of life is placed at from ten to twelve hundred by the various accounts, and the loss of material wealth by the destruction of the timber lands is enormous. The destitute people are flying in throngs from their homes to the larger towns, and each successive report increases the extent of the calamity. This stricken multitude requires aid as badly as do the Chicago sufferers, and the charity of the nation will thus have another call made upon it.
