CARRIER'S ADDRESS

JANUARY 1, 1863.

"Write me an ode," the printer said, "A sonnet on the new-born year, That cometh with its freight of fear And doubt, and hope, and nameless dread."

Alas! is this a time to wield In trifling mood an idle pen? The world shakes with the march of men, A million warriors are a field!

To-day the all-time question rings ; In Sinaic tones throughout the land, "Shall any self-ruled nation stand, Or are we born that priests and kings

May rule and ride us." And to solve , t The question, comes the crash of arms, And smoking towns and wars alarms, And daring deed and high resolve.

The rotten thrones of Europe reel As crimson dims the bayonets glance, And ring of sabre, ax and lance Answers the clang of armed heel.

Emperors and kings grow pale with dread . As from afar they scan the scane. Each wishing each to intervene-Each fearing for his throne and head.

For underneath each crown and throne Upheaves a thousand years of wrong; The menarch fears a poet's song

But not forever-they have found That thrones can fall and monarchs flee. Mine is no gift of prophecy, Yet, as the circling years roll round

I hear a little bird that sings, "The people by and by shall bo . The stronger:" and that time shall see The last of hicarchies and kings.

Poor Freedom, faint and worn, theday Is up for trial; and the cause Of equal rights, and equal laws, Leans wearily on the array

Of armed hosts; for since the good, Though tyrants ruled and cowards quailed, One simple law has never failed Freedom must be baptised in blood.

Such is the rule; and when the inrge Of charging columns shakes the plain, And rich red blood pours out like rain, Brave men shall sing no funeral dirge-But raise a grand old battle shout. Such as the Norseman raised of old, When, bursting from his mountain hold,

He put the southern hosts to rout. Heroic deeds are done to-day That put to naught the old-time Cids : That shall survive the pyramids, And still be young when time if gray.

THE BATTLE OF FREDERICKSBURG.—We have nearly full and reliable news from only a few of our county companies in regard to the casualties in the fate of our soldiers, their present condition, &c. The following note was written by Capt. CARLE the next day after the battle. It will be read with interest:

Our bitter trial days shall pass, So surely as the summer rain Will bring song-birds and flowers again, And billowy fields of grain and grass.

And those who fighting nobly fell, Have won a grateful nation's thanks; Where death swept down their shattered ranks, They slumber peacefully and well.

To them and to their deeds belong The brightest niche on History's page-They shall glide down from age to age The grandest theme of poet's song;

Then let us sing no sad refrain-

The days are glorious, if but we With eye of faith and hope will see The old prelude in grander strain Played o'er again to liberty. How shall we wolcome in the coming year? The north wind sings the requiem of the past,

The moaning pines bend low before the blast, And all is drear. Scattered throughout the land on vale and hill A hundred thousand of the nation's braves Are sleeping silently in nameless graves-

Oh! Abraham Lincoln, we did delegate To you a trust more worthy than a crown! Crush with a red right hand this treason down

And seal its fate. No monarch ever had such regal power As this free people placed within your hand; We ask but that you save the stricken land

In this dark hour. We have not pleaded to be spared the pain Of bitter parting in these days of dread, But we demand it, that the gallant dead

Die not in vain. Alas! from every hill-ide comes a moan Of desolation; by our Christmas fires Mourn weeping mothers, wives and childless sires, Bereaved and lone. Where is the patriotism that would not tire, Offering rich blood and treasure free as air? Where is the fervid glew that everywhere Burst forth like fire?

Ah, me! the weary Nation tires at length; Its army struggles on through wet and cold, But clouds of army harpies steal its gold And sap its strength.

Selfish ambition, envy, pride and greed, Have had in field and council too much sway--Curse on the scoundrels who would make their prey The country's need.

A heartless, office-secking, rabble rout Besets our capital-don't be too nice, Oh, father Abr'am, take a devil's advice, And kick 'em out.
