

A Talk with a "Poor White Man."

The correspondent of the Cincinnati Gazette, writing from Stevenson, Alabama, gives an interview had with a captured soldier belonging to Mississippi. We give a portion of it: "I was too proud," said he, with a tear glistening in his eyes, "to think of deserting even a bad cause after I had once engaged in it. But the fall of Vicksburg crushed my pride, and then I had no motive for continuing the contest. Why should we fight any longer? Since I came into your lines I heard a new advance which appeals so strongly to my own common sense, that I accepted it at once as the exact truth. It is this: the rebel leaders have themselves no longer hopes of success, and now they only desire to use our bodies to shield them as long as possible from the righteous wrath of the Federal Government."

"Are there many Mississippians in this army who entertain your sentiments?" "I do not know how it may be with others, but in my regiment there are not a score of men who would not gladly lay down their arms to-day, and agree to spend the rest of their lives in wondering how they could have been such fools as ever to take them up."

"I do not wish to flatter you," I remarked to him, "but you seem to be much more intelligent than men of your class usually are. Are you a native of Mississippi?" "Yes, sir," he answered, "I was born and raised near Holly Springs."

"My education," he said, "was obtained at a common school in my neighborhood. It was taught for three years by a man from Cleveland, Ohio, by the name of Sanders, and a most excellent teacher and estimable gentleman he was. Some of the rich families in our vicinity preferred to send their children to him rather than employ private tutors; and so with what he got from them, and what was obtained from the State, he made handsome wages."

"May I ask how it came," said I, "that you, with so much better abilities, both natural and acquired, than the mass of the soldiers in the rebel army, failed to obtain office among them?" He smiled at this. "My parents were poor and all the offices in our regiment I cannot think of one that has ever been held by a poor man's son."

"Were your parents slaveholders?" "Not at all. They owned and cultivated a little patch of ground, some miles from the city; the value of which was scarcely equal to that of a single slave."

"You would doubtless have obtained promotion at least," I suggested. "Not," he bitterly replied, "until every slaveholder or slaveholder's son in my company had been promoted before me."

"Did your company contain many such as yourself?" "Yes," said he, "three-fourths of them were poor men."

"And in your army it is the business of the poor to obey and not to command?" "That's it," he answered energetically, "that's it, and cursed be the men who dragged the poor into this war."

"Do you know," said I, "what became of Sanders?" "He was warned by a vigilance committee to leave the State before war broke out. He did so, or at least left our neighborhood, and I have never heard from him since."

REBEL CONFESSIONS.—A letter from a soldier in Johnston's army, written at Brandon, Miss., gives a pitiable account of the condition of the people and the armies in that part of the country. The writer, who is addressing a friend, says: "We are a defeated and ruined people; shorn of our strength, powerless for a success."

CANNIBALISM.—A good joke touching the rations of mule meat served out to the rebel soldiers in Vicksburg, is told of a private named Webb. On being informed of the necessity of feeding on mule flesh, he remonstrated, arguing "that the Confederate Government had contracted to give him beef, bread, &c. He had been a jackass the last two years of a soldier's life, that he'll aware to; and be d—d if he'd turn cannibal for all the Confederates in the world."
