Select Poetry.
[From the Washington Chronicle.]
BEFORE WASHINGTON.
BY M. H. COBB.
The skies are rent asunder with the simulated thunder
Of the brazen-throated cannon mite cannon-ferce
replung,
With the swelling roar and rattle of the varying tide
of battle,
With the moans of the wounded and the dying.
Thousands for battle eager every bristling height be-leager,
Hill and mountain, vale and woodland, with steely
death are gleaming, Dugle unto bugle calling, smoke and dust the skies
enveloping,
And battle-riven banners wildly streaming.
Mighty columns onward surging, forward to the foe-
men urging,
Over rifle pit and breastwork, till in war's red fan-
cise melted;
And the upper and the nether as a scroll are rolled together,
Into chaos, with the battle-lightning belted.
By hurdling lead and iron, (with death that all engulfed),
In the awful loom of conflict the waft of victory's woven;
Prone lie the horse and rider where the gulls are growing wider,
Through columns which the hissing shell has elo-
ven.
Alas, for those we cherish! They are swallowed up,
their eyes perish—
Ere their eyes have seen the triumph which crowns their grand endeavor!
But their blood shall water Edom till it bear the fruits of freedom,
And their sacrifice to man be a heritage forever.

Miscellany.
TRAPPING A MURDERER.
A Speculator's Story.
In the year 1853 I went to the Red River country, with a view of speculating in horses, lands, or anything that might give promise of profitable return for a cash investment. Of course I carried a good deal of money with me; but knowing I was going among a wild, lawless class, of every grade and color—among half-civilized Indians, negroes, gamblers, thieves, robbers, murderers and assassins, with perhaps a few settlers of some claims to honor and honesty, if they could be sifted out from the mass—I thought it the safest plan not to seem well-off in this world's goods. Accordingly I secured my money in a belt about my body, put on a very coarse, rough dress, which, by intentional carelessness, soon had a very mean and slovenly appearance; and allowed my hair and beard to mangle matters their own way, without any troublesome interference of razor or comb. Thus prepared, and armed with two revolvers and a bowie knife, I passed over some dangerous territory in comparative safety, and flattered myself that no one guessed my riches through my apparent poverty.
In fact, on two occasions, I began to think it might have been to my advantage to have looked a little more respectable. The first of these was when, in traveling among the Choctaw nation, I found a drove of horses that pleased me very much, and was told by the owner, in reply to my question as to what he would take a head for the entire lot, that he was not in the habit of naming his price to every wandering beggar that chose to satisfy his idle curiosity. I was disposed at first to put on some dignity, but concluded, after a careful survey of my person, that the man had good cause for speaking as he did, and so merely assured him that I knew an individual who wished to buy horses if he could get them at a fair price. However, he was not disposed to believe my statement, and so I passed him by, with the resolve that, if nothing better turned up, I would make him a call under more advantageous circumstances. As the second instance alluded to was similar to the first, it may be passed over without further notice.
But out of this same cause grew a very remarkable adventure, which it is my present purpose to relate.
While passing between two settlements, over a lonely, gloomy horsepath, leading through a dark hemlock wood, and while in the most solitary part, suddenly came before me, leaping from a thicket on the right, a human figure of a most startling appearance. It was a man of medium height, but of a stout, powerful frame, all covered with dirty tatters, that he appeared to have worn and wallowed in for years. He had no covering for his head or feet, and his skin was so coated with grime, that it was difficult at a first look to tell whether he belonged to the white race or not. His face, high up on his cheeks, was covered with a dirty brown beard, and his matted hair hung in wild profusion all around his head, except a little space before his swollen, blood-shot eyes; and altogether he looked like a madman or human devil. His hands held and swung a formidable club; and his attitude, as he leaped into the road before me, was one of fierce menace and defiance.
I stopped, in alarm, and, while fixing my eyes sharply on his, slid my hand into a convenient pocket, and grasped the butt of one of my revolvers, firmly determined to keep him at the short distance that divided us, or kill him if he advanced.
For perhaps a half minute we stood silently regarding and surveying each other, and then, resting one end of his club on the ground, and partly leaning forward, said, in a coarse, gruff tone, with a kind of chuckling laugh:
"Well, me! I's in hopes I'd got a prize at last; but if you're much better off nor me, you don't show it any, by—! I Stranger who are you, and where are you from?"
"Well," returned I, feeling highly complimented, of course, to know that I resembled such a villainous-looking object as himself, "some people call me a beggar, and I know I don't pass for a genteel gentleman."
"I'll swar that—haw! haw! haw!" was the chuckling response. "The world ha'n't made much of you more'n it has of me. I see steal in your face as plain as daylight. Say, what jail or penitentiary has you last?"
"Never mind that," said I, "probably not other of us has got our deserts."

Select Poetry.
"Well, if you had been decently dressed, and looked like you had five dollars about you, I'd have knocked your brains out!" pursued the villain, with a broad grin. "As it is, you kin pass, for I can swar 'n you ha'n't got a red!"
"Much obliged for your candor, any how," rejoined I.
He still stood before me, looking me straight in the eye, and now seemed to be pondering some new idea. Presently he muttered to himself:
"I think he might do." A moment after he said to me, "I say, old feller, how'd you like to make a raise?"
"How would I like to eat when hungry?" I answered, thinking it not unlikely that the scoundrel had some dark project in view, which, by seeming to chime in with him, I might discover.
"Well, I've got a plan," he said, throwing down his club as if to assure me of his politic intentions towards myself, and quietly advancing to my side; "I've got a plan that will give both of us a heap of money, and it'll just take two to carry it out. I've been a wanting a pat, and if you'll join I'll give you halves."
"If there's any chance to turn a penny, I'm your man," said I.
"Good!" returned he; "you look like a tramp, and I'll bet high on you. 'I don't know,' he added, sharply eyeing me; "I may be deceived, but I think I'll risk it. If you go for to play a game on me, you'd better look out for yourself, that's all."
"Do I look like a camp as would do that?" returned I, in indignant tones.
"Well, let's take a seat down here, and talk it over."
We found an old log, and sat down; and, after some preliminary conversation, my new and interesting acquaintance unfolded to me a most damnable scheme, the substance of which was as follows:
"He knew the country well for miles around, and the exact position and condition of every settler. One man, living in a rather lonely quarter, about five miles distant, was a speculator in horses and cattle, which he sometimes bought up and drove to a distant market. He had a good deal of money, which it was supposed he kept secreted in his dwelling; and to get possession of this money was, of course, the object in view. The trouble was, that the man himself was a brave, determined fellow, who always went well armed, and also had, besides his wife, two grown up sons and a daughter, which was a force too great for one individual to encounter. About a mile from him lived a poor widow, who had nothing worth stealing, except her clothes, which would be valuable for carrying out our plan. This plan was first to rob the widow of her clothing, dress me up in them, and have me seek lodgings at the speculator's house. Then, in the night, when all the family should be asleep, I was to unbolt the door, let in my confederate, and attempt the murder of the inmates—the robbery and burning of the house to be the concluding scene.
I secretly shuddered at the atrocity of the contemplated crime, but appeared to receive the disclosure with the business air of the most hardened wretch, enquiring as to the amount of money we should thus probably obtain, and objecting to nothing but the great risk that we should have to run, both before and after the accomplishment of our purpose. I permitted my eager companion to gradually quiet my fears, and at last consented to act.
When everything had been settled, we struck off into the fields to avoid being seen, and just before dark came in sight of the widow's house. As my companion was acquainted with the premises, I insisted that he should procure the female garments—but solemnly warned him that if he harmed the poor woman in the least, I would have nothing further to do with the affair.
As good luck would have it, the widow was not at home, and my friend managed to break in and get the necessary clothing without doing any further damage. The widow being a large woman, I had no trouble in arranging the dress so as to pass, in a dim light, for a tolerably respectable female; and then, having agreed upon the story I was to tell, how I would manage matters, and the signal that would assure my accomplice of all being right, we went forward together, till we came in sight of the house to be robbed, when I made my nearest way to the road, and continued on alone, reaching the dwelling about an hour after dark, and just as the family were concluding their evening meal.
Had my design been really what I had led my villainous companion to believe, I certainly never would have gone forward with such confident boldness; but feeling my conscience to be all right, and knowing I was acting upon a good motive, I kept up wonderful assurance, feeling curious to see how well I could play my part, and to what extent I could carry the deception.
I asked for lodging for the night, and for something to eat, and was kindly and hospitably received. The first thing that sent the blush of shame and confusion to my cheeks, was the coming forward of a young lady, beautiful as an houri, and in a sweet, gentle voice, asking me if I had walked far, if I was much fatigued, offering to take my hood, and telling me I should soon be refreshed with a cup of hot tea. This was a little too much for my equanimity. I could have got along with all the rest, without being especially disturbed; but I was then a young, unmarried man, and, though not particularly susceptible to female attractions in general, I thought I had never looked upon so lovely and interesting a creature before. I stammered out some unintelligible replies, kept my hood well drawn over my face, and asked to be permitted to have a few moments private conversation with the master of the house.
Of course this request caused considerable surprise—but it was granted; and as soon as we were alone together, I told him, in a few words, who and what I was, the strange adventure I met with, and disclosed in full the plot of my road acquaintance, to murder and rob him. He turned pale at the recital, and seemed much astonished, but begged me not to mention the design to his wife and daughter—
