

The Novelist & Physician

Some ten years ago Alexandre Dumas published a large novel, serially in a political journal. The heroine was represented as a person suffering from consumption, the first stage of which was already passed.

Her perspiration, cough, irritability and moodiness, by turns gay and melancholy, the poet's flights of her imagination, short, the whole category of phthisis were portrayed with that golden pen which the celebrated novelist still so definitely holds.

One morning, as he was about to conclude his work, a distinguished person from the court of Louis Philippe called to see the author.

The Marquis de... was announced. "Sir," says Marquis, "is your novel finished?" "Entirely," was the reply.

"And what becomes of the heroine in the end?" "You are fond of rare things, Monsieur le Marquis," says the novelist, laughing; "or else you wish to read in Arabian style—beginning at the end."

"I have," replied the visitor, "a more serious motive to justify my curiosity." "Well, then," says Dumas, "my poor sufferer dies in the last chapter."

"She must recover in that case," said his excellency. "But the plan has been carried out," "Then the conclusion must be altered."

"But the denouement is exceedingly striking." "Another must be found, however, and you may depend upon my gratitude."

Dumas stared with astonishment at the seigneur. "Why require this of a fictitious person?" said he.

"Because my only daughter suffers the same malady and the same symptoms," he had described, and the death of your heroine would be a mortal blow to the morale of my poor child, who follows her adventures anxiously in every morning's paper."

The far-famed writer pressed the father's hand. He revised the last part of his novel. The heroine was miraculously cured.

Five years afterwards Dumas met a beautiful lady, of transcendent charms, in the salon of M. de Montelivert; she was the marquis's daughter, married, and in the bloom of health.

"She has four children," said her father, introducing her. "And my book four editions," answered the novelist.

A man, noted for his calmness and a scolding wife, was one night stopped in the woods by a pretended ghost. I can't stop my friend," said he. "If you are a man, I must request you to get out of the way, and let me pass. If you are the devil, come along and take supper for I married your sister!"

Sometimes society gets tired of a man and hangs him. Sometimes a man gets tired of society and hangs himself.
