Occasional Lines Delivered at the New Year's Fedival, January 1, 1864, in the Zion's Evangelical Lutheran Church,

BY MASTER CHARLES H. BERGHER. And Written Expressly for Him by Wien Forney. The boys of Eighteen Sixty-three-Must ever famous be-as heroes in the good old cause, Of right and liberty. They've stood on many hard fought fields, To vet'rans face to face-They've bared their breasts to traitor foest The champions of their race.

Our grand-sires fought in seventy six. Right valiantly and true, And made the British Lion fear "The red, white and the blue;" Again, in Eighteen twelve, they stood, To face the self same foes-When haughty Albion bow'd beneath

Their brave and sturdy blows. and once beneath a Southern sun. Where Spanish warriors stood Our fathers met the Mexican By Rio Grande's flood-And there, the north-men bravely fought As fight the good and true,

And now the boys of Sixty-three In mortal fight array'd, Go forth to battle for the right, Undaunted-undismay'd; They meet in strife no foreign foes, A tyrant hither sonds-

And once again did victory gild

"The red, white and the blue !"

In "our erring South'rn friends," God bless the boys of Sixty three Whether on sea or land; They stand the champions of the right, A brave and sturdy band-And may the conflict which they wage Be blessed with victory:

And then a nation's honors fall

the presence of rain and mud, the proverbial quiet of the village of White Hall—three miles west of this city—was, for once, disturbed by the feport that Miss E—had eloped, while in route for church, with Captain V—, of the gallant Seventh Pennsylvania cavalry. As the affair became circulated every one ex-claimed: "It cannot be, for the Captain went claimed: "It cannot be, for the Capital went to join his regiment a week ago." And thus all thought; but it appeared that after spending is tow wheke in the neighborhood; perfecting his plans for future action, he bade farewell the bade had been under the invested. to his friends, leaving them under the impression that he was "off for the wars." But his apparent intentions were not in consonance with his movements, and after a concealment of a few days, on last Sunday night, he, with a few initiated friends, proceeded, not Leander-like, to cross the river in buggles, to steal from the arms of her prejudiced parients an only daughter. It appears that some few years ago, or about the time of the breaking out of the rebellion, an intimacy, was formed between the parties, which ripened into a mutual feeling of a holler kind, much to the amoyance of Pater Familias, who was impressed with the idea that the young man was rather poor in this world's goods—in which, however, he was mistaken; and he further objected on account of the political views of the young aspirant, who was a firm friend of the Union, in testimony whereof let a score of bloody battles testify, while the exapperated father was of a different way of thinking. Suffice it to say that, in spite of all her parents' watchulness, through some channel, a correspondence was kept up between the two, and whenever the Captain visited home he managed sub rosu to have frequent interviews with the adored one; and on his late visit, after managing to lull suspicion by an apparent return to the army, he, with a select few of his many friends, managed to elude strict parental rigilance, and carried of the prize. On hearing of the flight of his daughter, the father raved and went off in frequent anathemas, not polite in regard to the offending couple; but it is hoped that when he comes to know the real character of his son-in-law, he will relent somewhat, and be proud of the choice his daughter has made. Vengeance is threatened those who assisted in the affair, and suspicion rests on a medical student who has been yishting in the neighborhood—a friend of the parties whose movements at the time were rather mys-terious. But be things as they may, the parties are worthy each other, and we wish them God speed, hoping their honeymoon may never end, and that the cavalry officer's future may be spent among the infant-ry, in handing down to them the same patriotic principles that have done him so much honor during the present
