The Arms-Bearing Population. The proportion which the losses bear to the gains in the population subject to serve in the army is a difficult question to settle, though an important one. upon the military age.

The deaths, from natural causes, of the military class of the population, would amount ito 57,000 during the year, leaving the annual home increase 91,900. To this add the gain from immigration in the year 1861—the proportion of arms bearing population, which was 32,500, and the total increase of arms-bearing population of the country is 123,400. This is the increase in a state of peace, to which must be added the losses in war. This is computed at 92,000 for deaths in service, and 31,000 for disability and deaths after service, so that the total increase about makes up the losses. As the gain from immigration is about one-fourth to the fine appointment of an Assistant Secretary of War for one year, at a salary of three thousand dollars. It was said in explanation that the law heretofore passed had expired and the object was to revive it. Mr. Hooper (Mass.) offered an amendment to the increase in a state of peace, to which must be added the losses in war. This is computed at 92,000 for deaths in service, and 31,000 for disability and deaths after service, so that the total increase about makes up the losses.
