XXXVIIIth Congress—First Session.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

WASHINGTON, Feb. 27.

Mr. Harding (Ky.) argued against the President's plan of reconstruction, characterizing the scheme as a "penalty on the rebellion" and a "penalty on the loyal States." He (Mr. Harding) assumed that the secession ordinances were void, and in the termination of the rebellion the revolting States have a right to return, with all their privileges under the Constitution.

Mr. Denning (Conn.) maintained that though the President's plan is not beyond cavil, it is as complete and comprehensive as the intricacies of the subject will permit, and possesses the rare merit of the justice of the Government to the insurgent States and to the slave.

FROM FORTRESS MONROE.

Fortress Monroe, Feb. 26.

The steamer Virginia, from New York, reports that in passing Chesapeake Bay, yesterday, at 2 p. m., saw a full rigged brig, on the southern point of the Island, her upper decks out of water and sails furled.

Last evening, while the steamer City of Richmond was lying at anchor in Hampton Roads, the steamer Admiral Dupont ran into her, both receiving some damage. The City of Richmond had her bowsprit carried away. Several soldiers were knocked overboard from the Dupont, but it is believed all were saved.

The steamer S. R. Spaulding, arrived this afternoon from Beaufort, N. C., with forty rebel prisoners, including a Captain, two Lieutenants and their whole command, recently captured near Newbern, N. C.

John Kenny, Daniel Matthews and William Nicholson were arrested yesterday, charged with mutiny on board the United States steamer Cossack.

SPEECH OF HON. P. FRAZER SMITH, OF CHESTER.

Delivered in the House of Representatives, February 28, 1864, on the resolution proposing to require proofs of loyalty from persons receiving payment for damages by the rebel raid.

Mr. Speaker, I regret that the gentleman from Northumberland (Mr. Pomeroy) is not present, inasmuch as the fact that whatever may be said here to-day, or at any time during his absence, by any one, will be faithfully conveyed to him by the record of the proceedings of this body. That record, of what has passed in this discussion, will be a faithful reflection of the correctness of the gentleman from Delaware (Mr. Pomeroy) who has said that anything in this discussion which has given a party aspect across the field, from the remarks of the gentleman from Northumberland. When the gentleman from Chesterfield (Mr. Boyer) very properly made the inquiry how the standard of loyalty was to be ascertained, he said nothing about party, but left the question open, whether this application of a test of loyalty referred to Republicans or Democrats. No sooner, however, had the gentleman from Northumberland stood upon his feet, than he assumed that the loyalty of some of the gentlemen from Washington, was a direct attack upon the Democratic party. Without being able to choose as good words as the gentleman from Washington, I will say that men who expose themselves before they are assailed, are their own accusers.

What is there, sir, in this resolution or this preamble:

"Whereas, There is reason to believe that the rebelious of Pennsylvania have in a great measure, brought about through the connivance and by the encouragement of disloyal persons in our own State;

"And whereas, Claims for damages done during those invasions are now being presented to this Legislature; therefore,

"Resolved, That the select committee to whom are referred all matters in relation to claims arising out of alleged losses from the rebelion of 1862 and 1863, be instructed to report as part of their bill—if they report a bill—a clause requiring the parties presenting claims to furnish satisfactory proofs of their loyalty."

Is there anything said here about Democracy or Republicanism? The question presented is a great, a glorious question, to be put to every man, and every man ought to meet it, under any circumstances.

The gentleman from Franklin (Mr. Shaeffer) gave as a reason, why this resolution should not be adopted, that a very large proportion of the claimants would be Republicans. Where, 'you say, Mr. Speaker, a Republican here, in person or by his representative, claiming to be freed from this test? Who do you find any man claiming to be freed from this test who is a loyal man? There is no such man—no loyal man fears this test. No loyal man will hesitate to come up and meet the test, which will establish his loyalty so far as, with propriety and consistently with the rules of law, we can establish it.

Now, sir, you find in such distinction in this resolution of the preamble. It applies to every man without reference to party. I am prepared to meet it, and gentleman on the other side, I doubt not, are prepared to meet it; the gentleman from Franklin doubtless is prepared to meet it, whenever and wherever it comes. I had met it when I have gone down to take that solemn oath of allegiance, expressive of their love of their country and their determination to stand by it. Why should we not meet it, sir? We met it when we first stood up as legislators here; we met it when we entered upon any public office, when we proposed ourself in the halls of our National Legislature, and which has been developed throughout the whole land, through those who have taken the same oath as ourselves, as legislators, as lawyers, or in any position they may occupy in the land—when, by reason of that, we propose now to go further into detail, and to ask a man to support the Constitution of his State, and above his State, of his nation, why should we be met by gentlemen saying, "You meet it. Let us meet the question, and let us meet together as one man, throwing aside all these questions of party, when we come to consider a question paramount to all party, to life, and to everything but our accountability to Him who formed us as a nation.

Sir, one test of loyalty that I would put to every man that a man should be desirous to repel the invaders from our own State. I speak of our own State just at this moment, but I say that far above the State is the nation. Yet how was it when these men who were the cause of this great loss, who inflicted this injury upon the citizens of the great Cumberland valley—who was it in this very town, and in these very halls, when this mighty army, which had ravaged its own country, proposed, as it was said by the Governor of this Commonwealth but a short time since, to breathe for a while the free air of Pennsylvania, and that they would never breathe before? All around this hall, at that time, and in this hall—I speak that which I do know—men were sneering at the efforts of the Executive of the State and the Executive of the nation to repel the invasion. I heard with my own ears men who, if in their places, would not be within the sound of my voice, members of the Legislature of Pennsylvania, sneering at these efforts to repel invasion, and speaking of it, as if no invasion existed. Had they wanted but a few days they would have found that there was hardly a house in all this State without its mourners, because of those who did upon the battle-field of Gettysburg to repel that invasion. Shame upon such men and upon those who sustain them!

I am happy here to say that one of those men, a member of the Legislature of Pennsylvania, was rebuked by a gentleman, now a member of this House, who I do not see in his seat, but who does not belong to this side of the House. Honor be to that man wherever he is. I speak of him only. I doubt not that there are many more like him. Such, I say, is one test of a man's loyalty.

With some of the sentiments which were uttered by the gentleman from Northumberland I can agree. I can agree that true Democracy and loyalty are convertible terms. I can agree that the Democracy upon which the institutions of this country are based, the principle which is to be found in every true man, whether he calls himself Republican or Whig, or Federal, or Democrat, can agree that Democracy is a convertible term with loyalty. But what do you understand by Democracy? Do you understand that you shall adhere to the opinions of those whom, as an organized party, you follow—men such as those who denounced Jackson, and Jefferson, and think? If that is a test of Democracy, it is not the Democracy that I follow, and have followed for years. What I take to be the true Democracy is that which recognizes the will of the people, expressed by the majority through the forms which they have adopted, and carried into execution by the power of the people, through the officers who have been chosen by them according to the provisions of the Constitution. You will find that Democracy you will not find in the assailing of their Government because a man has been chosen to conduct its affairs, whom they did not choose to put into authority. You will find Democracy in the support of the Government, under all circumstances, in which it may be placed, and especially in the putting down of such a rebellion as we are now witnessing—a rebellion which was reserved for us alone, of all the inhabitants that have dwelt upon the face of the earth, to witness. This is the Democracy of Washington, this is the Democracy of Jackson, and of that old man now tottering to his grave, who was, and of Douglas, who has gone to his grave, from the same platform of Democracy—a platform upon which he rallied so many of the true citizens of his country.

Now, I say here—and I am willing to have this brought back upon me at any time—that a man who cannot come up to this Democracy and loyalty, who cannot come up to this test has no loyalty about him. I will not make any application; let every man make the application for himself. I am not prepared to meet it myself, but I am prepared to meet it by every true man who has prepared to meet it by his own loyalty, and the loyalty which emanates from principles like these, I think which puts the Government of the United States above every government that is formed under it, that makes it supreme, that recognizes no pretentive heresy of State rights which would lead a man to say, "My State calls upon me to do this, and I am therefore a loyal man, while the State calls upon me to do that, and I am therefore a loyal man." I am prepared to meet it by every true man who may be rebelling against the Government of the nation. Out upon such loyalty! Let us never hear of that in these halls. Oh, that we had never heard of it in this country! and those rivers of blood which have been pouring down over every hillside and into the beautiful streams of our country, would never have marked their beauty, and the broken hearts which are now to be seen in every eye, and every eye which weeps upon this earth—those tears, never would have been shed, those hearts never would have been broken.

And yet the gentleman from Philadelphia to-night has undertaken to say that the Administration of this great nation is disloyal, and he has charged this blood, and these tears, and this disloyalty, and this sorrow upon the shoulders of the Administration. He has stood up, he has stood up to challenge our national existence, and begged forgiveness through the magnificent howl, but he has done so at the time it was issued—when through all that our President has done, in almost every public paper that he has issued, the same "one may be seen" in the words of the gentleman from Philadelphia charged to try to get the government, in the exercise of the power that was given him under the Constitution, and in pursuance of his oath, he has endeavored to suppress; this attempt to destroy this nation and to retard the chariot of freedom. Heaven only knows how long.

Let us have right views upon this subject. Let us not test our loyalty by any such scheme as that of those men who have arisen in the South, and have poisoned the minds as well as the hearts of many in the North with the belief that this great nation, formed by the people, was a mere compact of States. Why, when as boys we read our Constitution, those of us whose heads are now grey, we never looked upon the government of the United States as a compact of States. We read it there as plain as A, B, C, that "we, the people," form a great government; and we read there, too, that the great Government, formed by the people, certain rights and powers for its preservation; and that in the exercise of those powers and the maintenance of those rights this government of the United States was supreme; that when the government enacted laws, through our constituted authorities and through the forms which the people had deputed, those laws were supreme, and the man was a traitor and a scoundrel—those who then denigrate them, and they are the now—who deliberately say that any State has rights which will put it above the government of the United States, and that we, as citizens of this State or any other State, should obey the behests of our State to the overturning of the government of the United States.

Now, sir, I say, as a result of these principles, that, coming up to this standard in such a time as this no loyal man will stop to inquire what are the causes of the war. There is a man here to-night, I believe, from that party; there is an effort to bring men who have been men to resign over us. Yes! I use the word resign, for they look to a monarchy, if not to despotic power. I say that they look to bringing men of that kind to resign over us under those circumstances. I say a man has no loyalty who betrays his heartlessness to his country, by alleging as an excuse for that heartlessness, a disloyalty to sectionalism brought on this war. Suppose it did. Why, there has been sectionalism in this country since 1820, and we at the North, under the protest of the same base hearts and base minds in the country, yielded to that sectionalism. We met it again about 1832, '3, and '4, and we yielded again. And the gentleman who says that that sectionalism was developed by the free States of the North has not read history aright; he has read it with a worse than Landis' eye with a perverted judgment. It is not for me here to say what other principles might have been operating upon him when he thus interpreted history as saying that sectionalism arose at the North, or was carried into effect there. Nor will a man who has any loyalty, when we are standing up here against all the power of rebellion, disloyalty, thieving rebellion, sneer at the efforts that our Government in her wonderful throes is using for the purpose of sustaining herself.

The gentleman from Northumberland indulged in a great deal of wit, I suppose—I do not know that it was not wit—about the taxes and the licenses which are laid upon us. Why, is that not constitutional? Is it not constitutional for the Government to impose such a tax? It may be hard that a tax should be imposed for the purpose of raising money to support the armies, to repel invasion, and to crush the rebellion. I can understand the feelings of those who do not want the rebellion crushed. I can understand that a man who desires that this rebellion may succeed, should feel very much annoyed, and expend his caracaras and all his wit upon the action of the Government in raising revenue in this way; but a man who is loyal at heart, who heartily desired to put down this rebellion, would not, I think, sneer at the means which have been used—constitutional means, too, it cannot be denied—to crush the treason.

Loyalty will not throw discredit upon the currency of the country. Why, what a sight have we here! A nation of fifty millions of people who have had to give one dollar for fifty cents of the outside; having carried on this war with hundreds of thousands of men—fighting, dying, and being killed; with hundreds of thousands of dollars of the great nations of France and England—and at this day having gone to work and raised money upon such a system that she has brought her six per cent loans up to seven or eight per cent, in advance of their par value; and still we find the "lender" at the counter of the country, saying that we will be bankrupt! Why, a man that can get seven or eight per cent above par for his obligations is not yet esteemed to be bankrupt. But, suppose I will go—suppose that this currency was as "lender" by the men who have been referred to by my friend from Washington, and who traversed the State anterior to the election and denunciation of Lincoln, that to the salvation of the country? How was it with our revolutionary ancestors? They resisted to the death the payment of one cent imposed upon them by a Legislature in which they had no representation, and they "took joyfully the spoiling of their goods" by their own people, and for the defence of their own liberties. How many beautiful farms in the eastern part of this State have been swept away from their owners, who gave them up cheerfully, and who had nothing to support themselves but the Continental currency! And yet we hear of a gentleman upon this floor, the floor where sits the chairman occupied by the great leader of the signers of the Declaration of Independence, venturing without a blush to boast—yes, to boast of his Democracy and his loyalty; and with a sneer endeavoring, so far as he has it in his power, individually and from his official position, to bring discredit upon the very means by which the rebellion is to be put down. Now, I do not say that the gentleman does not want to have the rebellion put down, but I do say that I cannot interpret his language in any other way. He may be able to do it, but I cannot.

There are other points in this question, sir, which I have noted down, but I cannot enlarge upon them at this time. Loyalty men will not discourage exhortations. I do not say that this has been done by the gentleman from Northumberland, but I do say that you will find such men—men who are talking about their duty to support the Constitution—men who are talking about the same time discouraging and denigrating those heroes who are now shedding their blood for their country. You will find them printing about the Constitution; when every act shows that they are in sympathy; if not in co-operation, with those who are assailing it with armed hands. You find them glorying in the defeat of our armies, and you will find them rejoicing when our adversary succeeds, mourning when he falls.

Now, sir, I will put a question just here, and I want to call the attention of every gentleman in this House to it, and I ask members to answer it, and to meet the facts upon which the question is based. How is it, I ask, that you look in vain in the files of papers which the gentleman from Northumberland enumerated here the other day, for any commendation of loyal men whose praise is in the month of the whole country? You do not find it there. You can find plenty of strong articles upon the subject of the maintenance of the Constitution, if you do not understand what the Constitution means according to these teachings, we are very dull indeed, because we have had lectures and lectures upon it, both upon the hustings and in these papers; but when you find any praise of men who have stood before the nation and before the world as the defenders of the Constitution and the defenders of the country, you do not find it in those papers or in those speeches.

It has been said somewhere—I think by Blackstone—that you can judge the character of a people by their poetry. Now, in the Revolution we had the good old song of "Yankee Doodle," as part of the national poetry, and our hearts thrill to-day when we hear it. When the drum goes along with the sound of "Yankee Doodle," it brings tears to my eyes, when I see that drum before a band marching on to the battle field to defend my friends, or when I find them returning with their thinned ranks, and see the widows of those who have left behind—standing and looking in vain, and knowing they are looking in vain for their husbands; and the mother coming and looking for her dear boy, knowing that she shall never see him again on this side of the Jordan. "Yankee Doodle" then goes to my heart.

In the war of 1812, loyal men had the glorious "Star Spangled Banner," and we rejoice in it again. Now the loyal men have introduced another song, to an old nursery rhyme, the "New York Day Book"; and that it might not be lost to us benighted Pennsylvanians, it is found to-day in that loyal paper, the Patriot and Union. Lucea non lucenda. I will read it:

"Sing a song of greenbacks,
Pockets full of trash;
O'er head and ears in debt,
And out of ready cash.
Heaps of tax-collectors!"

I think the gentleman from Northumberland must have read this before he made his speech.

"Heaps of tax-collectors,
As busy as a bee,
Ain't we in a pretty fix,
With gold at fifty-three?"

Abe in the White House,
Proclamations writing,
Made on the Rapidan,
Afrail to do the fighting!"

Made afraid to do the fighting! Publish that within fifty miles of Gettysburg! Send it throughout this town and perhaps to Gettysburg itself, and call men out upon Cemetery Hill to read that Meade was afraid to do the fighting! God have mercy upon us if Meade had been afraid to do the fighting! Where would have been your capital this day if Meade had not been afraid to do the fighting? And yet is not this confirming what I said a moment ago, that you will look in vain in the papers of which I have spoken to find praise of our great men? Meade afraid to do the fighting! Why, it could only have been worse if it had been said that our Reynolds was afraid to do the fighting—that great man who fell at the first onslaught, and saved the State. Meade, who commanded that great army put into his hands the very hour almost that he was called into the fight—Meade afraid to do the fighting!

"Swart in the cabinet,
Surrounded by his spies,

Halleck with the telegraph
Busy forging lies,
Chase in the Treasury,
Making worthless notes;
Curtin at Harrisburg,
Making shoddy coats.
Gillmore at Charleston,
Lost in a fog!"

If Gillmore is hidden in a fog, it is the fog that he has made himself by those cannon whose bullets he has poured upon Sumter, shooting down the dirty rag that so many men even here in Pennsylvania love better than the stars and stripes. But it is down, and they may run it up once more, and it will go down again. Gillmore, who took Fort Warren, lost in a fog! No, there is no fog about Gillmore. We see him plainly here, though we have never set our eyes upon him. We know him here, standing up for the country and those of the brave men that have been under him. Neither he nor those who have been lost in a fog; and the day will come when they will stand out in the open of a clear sun, when the great firmament of this nation is cleared of the fog of rebellion.

But that is not all:

"Forney under Abe's chair,
Barking like a dog,
Schenck down at Baltimore,
Doing dirty work,
Bury at Norfolk,
As savage as a Turk"

Well, now, upon this Turk question, I suppose they would use the language of their friends South of Mason and Dixon's line, who are endeavoring to overturn our government, and would call Butler a beast, only it would not make rhyme; but I suppose Turk will do as well as beast. I want just such Turks as Butler—the kind of Turk who, when an apple down the flag of my country, will bang him. [Applause.] And if a man is a Turk for us, let us have a few more Turks, and let those Turks be not merely at New Orleans, or at Fortress Monroe, or at Newbern, but let them go to work in Pennsylvania, mayhap at Harrisburg.

There is a little more yet.

"Sprague in Rhode Island, Eating apple sass;"

Now, I must say that this shows a great deal of reason, though it was made to fill up the rhyme. Why, out of his own pocket Sprague defrayed the expense of an entire regiment, and started them off in April, 1861, to protect the Capital; and therefore he ought to be secured at by men who desired his fall. What has he done? His State, which, according to the theory, is above the government, has sent him there to represent her in the Congress of the United States, and what has he ever done that should call down the sneers of any man, unless it was that he defended his country? I agree that in their eyes that is sufficient cause.

"Brevert at Gettysburg,
Talking like an ass,
Banks out in Texas,
Trying to cut a figure."

He is cutting a pretty handsome figure, unless I am mistaken. He has got into Texas, and he has cut a piece out of territory formerly held by the rebels; he has put the army of the United States, which in due time will march through Texas, and that State will belong to the Union again. I doubt not we shall soon hear that he is cutting a figure at Mobile also.

"Beecher in Brooklyn,
Howling for the nigger,
Lots of abolitionists,
Kicking up a yell;
In comes Aaron Brownlow,
And sends them all to hell.
Burnside at Knoxville,
In a kind of a fix;"

Is not Burnside in a fix? I reckon he fixed Longstreet. I reckon he, and Grant, and Thomas, and Hooker, did some little fixing out there a short time ago; and that fixing, I want you to bear in mind, is the occasion of all this kind of poetry, and of all such speeches as we have heard in this House from the gentleman from Northumberland.

Now, they have left the last great man for the last. We will see what they sung about him.

"Dalriggan at Sumter,
Founding at the bricks;
Grant at Chattanooga,
Trying Bragg to thrash;
Is any wonder
The Union's gone to smash?"

Grant! Oh! could they not have spared that great man? Could they not have felt that they were trespassing too much upon the patience of the people of this country, assailing Grant in this way? Did they know that one-half of them are anxious that Grant should be their candidate for the Presidency? And will they say that Grant's great victory of Chattanooga is a step toward bringing the Union to smash? Had the gentleman from Philadelphia read that before he made his speech to-night, and talked about the Government of this country continuing this war for the sake of continuing themselves in power! Are Grant's actions like the continuance of the war? Keep Grant there, and I tell you that the war is soon to close.

I have dwelt upon this longer than I expected, but I wished to show just what is the sentiment of those people who stand up here in this and other States of the North, and accuse those who are sustaining the Government of disloyalty, whilst every day that they are speaking they issue from their accredited organs such treacherous articles and doggerel rhymes as this. I agree again with my friend from Washington in saying that this does not belong to the mass of the people of this country. The hearts of the mass of those who belong to the great Democratic organization, as they now term it, are with their country. But they have fallen, I know not how; they have fallen into the hands of the Philistines; and men who have been assailing them for years and years, now assume to lead them, and they lead them to their destruction.

The gentleman from Northumberland, when he referred to the destruction of his newspaper, asked who dispersed of that. Well, now, I will ask a question before answering that. Who dispersed of running the Tories away in the lines of the Revolution? Who dispersed of the Committee of Safety that our fathers got-up in the Revolution? It was not the loyal men of that day; it was not the men who went out and fought for their country; it was the men whose sympathies were with Great Britain that dispersed of it. Who dispersed of the hanging of Andre? Just the men who wanted Andre's treason carried out.
